Britard Le Bovier de

THE

" 12 Com file

HISTORY

ORACLES

AND THE

CHEATS

OF THE

Pagan Priests.

In Two Parts.

Made English.

LONDON, Printed in the year, 168 and fold by most Bookfellers.

of the nature, to

TOTHE

Right Honourable

GEORGE

Lord Jeffereys,

Baron of Wem, Lord High Chancellor of England.

MY LORD.

Ho' Your Quality and the Awfulness of your High Station, might very well prevent the Ambition of an Author from making Addresses

TOTEL

TARES.

AND MICHE

in Two Paren. Nr. 1,82

The Epistle

of this nature, to your Lordship, yet I confess my self less discouraged by the grandeur of your Titles; than I am by that of your Wit; 'tis that alone that brings me trembling to your Feet with this little Tribute of my Duty. Methought when all the honest part of the World was full of your Praise, when all that profess Loyalty were Celebrating your never dying Name, I shou'd have lookt upon my self as unworthy of the Honour I now aspire to, if I amongst the number, should not with all imaginable gratitude pay my acknowledgments for the good you have rendred the publick, as well as for the Services you have rendred the Crown; which you have more

Dedicatory.

more effectually done, with more noble Bravery, Fortitude and Relignation, than any, or ther great States-man; you have so absolutely attached your self to the interest of your Monarch, that 'tis evident you are as intirely his own, as if after him you had no more business with the World, or even Life it self; and to this Glory you have arriv'd by such difficulties as no other Parts, Wit, or Courage could have conquer'd, and by it have carried your great Fame even above Envy.

Nor can the unthinking and most malicious of your Enemies reproach your Lordship with self-interest in any of your Services, since all the World knows, when they were thought Criminal, nay even Punishable, (for such miserable times we have seen ) when 'twas enough to have forfeited your Fortune, and almost your Life, then, Tray, there was found in your Lordship, that undaunted Bravery, that Spirit and fire of Loyalty, that true concern for the Royal Cause, that you were the first destind Victim for the flaughter, the first to be Sacrificd to the Association Rage, even when you had nothing lest you but Honour, Justice and Innocence for your Guard. And as it may be truly affirm'd that the greatness of your Resolution gave the most consi-"derable assistance to the turn of those Rabble-ruling times, and the reestablishing them in their right

A 3 minal,

The Epistle

Dedicatory.

right and regular motion, it must be also confess'd that the same unchangeable resolution has continued them still (under God and our Gracious Sovereign) in the same tranquillity we now behold them; and we, who have reap'd the advantages of so good a conduct, have now no more to do but to express our sense of it in our several degrees; the People by their Prayers, and the Poets by their Panegyricks. Such I would gladly offer in Immortal Songs; but oh! the Muses have all taken Wing, and are fled to Climates more encouraging and kind, and have scarcely lest behind them one Son inspir'd; so that instead of Nobler numbers, they are necessi-

The Epistle

cessitated servilely to creepaster the sence of foreign Authors, stinting the Generous fancy to anothers thought.

Of this nature, my Lord, is this small Piece which I most hum: bly Dedicate to your Lordship. 'Tis a Discourse of Religion, in a time when we have scarce a: ny other Theme; tis grown fo general a Mode, that even the Sword-men are now fiercer difputants than heretofore the lazier Gown-men, were, while every Spark of noise enough. ( sometimes the best of the Argument) shews his Wit and Learning on that Subject. But fince the stream runs that way, I believ'd it as ridiculous to appear in good company drest like Mrs. Abigail, as Cat this time) time) not to be arguing some points of Religion, tho never so Mal à propo. But least, by such an undertaking I should, as many do, but the more embarass the Mystries of it, we shall treat here only of the Pagan Religion, and of the abominable Cheats of the Oracles and their Priests.

Dedicatory.

My Author, who is of the French Nation, has here given us a collection of many diverting and useful remarks on the Ancient Religion of the Pagans, and a very good account of those Oracles that once made so great a noise in the World; and which, I believe, will not be unpleasant to the Readers.But if in the result, it have but the Honour of being approv'd by your Lordship I shall, be very happy

The Epistle, &c.

happy in the occasion it gives me of begging leave to subscribe my self,

My Lord,

Tour Lord spip's

Last to the Man susmer

most humble and omer Johana bad ei

Chirold on the Charles of the St

e lesse flivers coiled Lei Li chas

most obedient Servant,

and water in her suff where

vel Brong purposed of M

Mark ed Alama Lost in sand serie it , dans A. Bi

ં સાંદ્ર

Front.

THE

PREFACE

TOTHE

History of Oracles.

Ot long since there fell into my Hands a small Book written in Latin, de Oraculis Ethnicorum, or of the Heathen Oracles, composed by Mr. Van-Dale Do-Stor of Physick, and printed in Holland. in which I found that the Author has Strenuously refuted the commonly received Opinion, that the ancient Oracles were delivered by Dæmons, and that they ceased wholly at the coming of Jesus Christ. The whole Work appeared to me to be full of Knowledge in Antiquity and profound Learning: Which gave me a great Curiosity to translate it, that the Ladies and those Gentlemen, who do not much care to read Latin.

Latin, might not be deprived of so aexecable and useful a Discourse. But I reflected, that a Translation of this Book (though excellent in its Original) would not be so good if too classly turned into French: For Mr. Vandale wrote only for the Learned, and had Reason to neglect those Ornaments and Softnesses, which they do not esteem; he cites a great Number of Passages very faithfully, and bis Versions are wonderful exact when be translates from the Greek; he enters also into a discussion of many Points of Criticism, which, though they are not always necessary, yet they are always curious; and this he does, to gratifie the Learned, who care little for flourishing Reflections, Discourses of Morality, or pleasant Wit.

Resides, Mr. Van-Dale makes no difficulty very often to interrupt the Thread of his Discourse, and to introduce other things which present them selves: And from one Digression he sometimes passes to another, and so perhaps to a third. And herein he does not amiss, since those for whom he writes,

The Preface.

are fitted for the Fatigue of Reading, and this Learned Disorder does not at all embarass or perplex them. But those, for whom I design this Translation, would have been very ill accommodated, if I had taken this Method: The Ladies, and the Major Part of the Men of this Country, are indeed more pleased with the Graces and Turns of Expression and Thought than with the most exact Enquiries and profoundest Arguments: And being very fond of ease, they desire to read Books written in a facile Method, that they may be the less obliged to a troublesome Attention. For this Reason, I laid-by the thoughts of translating, and thought it would be better, preserving the Foundation and principal Matter of the Work, to give it altogether another Form. And I confess, that no Man can extend this Liberty farther than I have done; for I have changed the whole Disposition of the Book, and have retrenched whatever appeared to me, either of too little Profit in it self, or of too little Pleasure to make amends for that little Profit. I have not not only added all the Ornaments I could think of, but many things which prove or clear up what is in Question upon the same Subject and the same Passages, which Mr. Van-Dale furnished me withal. I argue sometimes in a manner contrary to his, and I have not been scrupulous to insert many Real sons wholly my own: In fine, I have new cast and modelled the whole Work. and have put it into the same Order as I should have done at first (to have pleased my particular view) had I had so much Knowledge as Mr. Van-Dale; but, fince I am far from it, I have borrowed his Learning, and ventured to make use of my own Wit and. Fancy ( such as it is,) to adorn it. Nor should I have fail'd to have pursued his Method, had I had to do with the same Persons as he had. And if it shall happen that this comes to his Knowledge, I beseech him to pardon the Liberty I have taken, since it will serve to show the Excellency of his Book: For certainly what belongs to him will still appear extremely fine, tho' it have passed through my Hands.

The Preface.

I have lately learned two things, which have Relation to this Book. The first out of the Tracts called *Nou- * For the velles, &c. or News from the Com- Month of monty wealth of I green and the Com- June 1686. mon-wealth of Letters, which is, that Mr. Mæbius, chief of the Professor of Divinity at Leipsick bas undertaken to confute Mr. Van-Date. He acknowledges indeed, that Oracles did not cease at the Coming of Jesus Christ, (which will be indisputable when we Shall have examined that Question;) but he will by no means yield, that Dxmons were not the Authors of Oracles. So that he himself makes a very considerable Invasion on the common Opinion, in allowing Oracles to extend themselves beyond the time of the coming of Christ; and it will be a great Argument that they were not delivered by Dæmons, but by the Cheats of the Priests, if the Son of God did not silence them. 'Tis certain, that according to the usual Acceptation of these two Notions, what destroys the one extremely Shakes the other, or rather quiteruins it: And this perhaps, after the reading of this Book, will be readily acknowledged to be so.

- But what is more remarkable, is that I found in the Same Book, that one of Mr. Mæbius's strongest Reason's against Mr. Van-Dale, was that God forbad the Israelites to consult Wizards and the Spirits of Python, whence he concludes that Python, that is to fay the Dæmons, managed the Oracles, and that it was by their Aid that the Ghost of Samuel was made to appear. Mr. Van-Dale may answer what he pleases, but for my part, I declare, that under the Name of Oracles, I do not pretend to comprehend Magick: In which it is not to be disputed but that Damons are concerned: nor is it comprehended in what we commonly understand by the word [Oracle] not even according to the Sence of the ancient Heathens, who on one side regarded Oracles with Respect, as a part of their Religion, and on the other Hand bad a Horror for Magick, as well as we. To go and consult a Necromancer, or Some Witch of Thessaly, like Ericto in Lucan, was not called, going to an Oracle; and if we mark it, this distin-Etion is true, even according to the common Opinion, which affirms that Oracles ceased seased at the coming of Christ, and yet no Man can pretend that Magick then reased. So that the Objection of Mr.Mæbius makes nothing against me, if he take the word [Oracle] in its ordinary and natural Signification, as well ancient as modern.

The Preface.

The second thing I have to speak of is, that I am advertised that the Reverend Father Thomasin, a Priest of the Oratory famous for so many excela lent Books, wherein he has joined solid Piety to Profound Learning, has taken from this Book the Honour of first broaching this Paradox, by treating On racles as meer Knavery (in his Book ralled, The Method of Study, and of teaching the Poets to Christian Children.) I confess I was a little troubled at this, but I pacified my self with reading the twenty first Chapter of the eleventh Book of this Method, where I found nothing relating to my Opinion, fave only that in the nineteenth Article; there are a very few words to the following Sence: The true Reaford (fays he) why Silence was imposed on Oracles, was, because by the Invocation cation of the Divine Word, truthhas enlightned the World, and spread abroadabundance of Light far different from what was before, by which Men are emancipated from the Illusions of Augurs and Astrologers, the Observations of the Entrails of Beasts, and the greatest part of Oracles: Which were indeed but Impostures, whereby Men deceived one another with obfcure Words that borea double Sence: In fine, if there were Oracles, in which the Devil spoke, the coming of the Incarnate Truth condemned the Father of Lyes to an eternal Silence.'Tis however very certain that Dæmons were consulted, whenever Men had Recourse to Inchantments and Magick, as Lucan reports of Pompey the younger, and as the Scripture affures us concerning Saul. I agree that in such a great Treatise, which mentions Oracles but by the by (and that without any Design of searching into the depth of the matter)it is enoughto attribute the most part of Oracles to the Contrivances and Deceits of Men, and to make a Question whether there were any of them at all in which Dxmons were concerned, and to allow the Dæmons no farther Imployment than comes within the Compass of Incantations and Magick; and in fine to prove that Oracles ceas'd, not because the Son of God imposed Silence on 'em, all of a sudden; but because the most enlightned Wits were disabused by the Publication of the Gospel: Which still supposes that those humane Artifices could not be detected in a little time. However in my Opinion a Question decided in So few Words ought to be treated of a-new, and that in all its natural Extent, without any Mans being offended by the Repetition; for tis putting in great, what the World has hitherto seen but only in little; and so in little, that its Objects are scarce perceptible.

The Preface.

I know not whether it be permitted me to enlarge my Preface, by making a short Observation upon the Stile I shall use, which is familiar, and after the manner of conversing: And I Imagine that I entertain my Reader so much the more pleasingly, because I must, as it were, dispute with him: And the matter which I have in Hand, being often capable enough of being turned into Ridicule, engaged me in a Manner of Writing far different from that of Sublime; since I am of Opinion that none ought to write loftily; but he that writes in Defence of himself, it is so little natural. I tonfess, that the low Stile is yet something worse, but there is a Medium of a very great Latitude; yet 'tis mighty hard to take that Pitch which is necessary, and to keep steady to it:

THE

THE HISTORY

OF

ORACLES.

directly an History of Oracles; I only intend to argue against that common Opinion which attributes 'em to Dæmons, and will have 'em to cease at the coming of Jesus Christ. In doing this 'tis necessary that I run through the whole History of Oracles, that I unfold their Originals, their Progress, the different Manners in which they were deliver'd; and lastly their Decay, with the same exactness as if I were in these matters pursuing the Natural and Historical Order.

В

It

The History of Oracles. It is not at all furprizing, that Philosophers shou'd have so much trouble in finding out the fecrets of Nature, her Principles being so hidden that 'tis rashness in Men to think to discover 'em. But when we have no more to do, but to enquire whether the Oracles were a Trick and Artifice of the heathen Priests, or not, and at what time they ceas'd, Where lies the difficulty? Cannot we that are In posed on every day, imagine how si other Men'may have been deceiven or deceived? But especially when the whole matter turns upon the time when Oracles ceased, Where can the forein what time or in what Age the last Oracles, of which we have any difficulty be? There are many Book that treat of Oracles; let us see there knowledge, were deliver'd.

Men are not willing to suffer the decision of things to be too ease and therefore they mingle their own prejudices with truths, and so create greater perplexities than are Naturelly found therein; and those scru ples, which our felves frame, give w the most pain to untangle. And in my opinion this business of Oracles hath no considerable difficulty in it, but what we our selves have raised. It is in it's own Nature, a matter of Religion amongst the Pagans, and become fo without any necessity amongst Christians, and on both sides it is loaded with prejudices which obscure the clearest truths.

I confess that prejudices are not in themselves common to a true as well as a false Religion; for they Reign chiefly in the false, which is only the contrivance of humane Wit; but in the true(which is the production of God alone,) there wou'd none be ever found if humane Wit cou'd be prevented from Intermedling and mixing something of its own with it; for all its new inventions are but prejudices without ground, and it is not able to add any thing real or folid to the great work of God. Nevertheless these prejudices that are in the true Religion are, as I may fay, so closely interwoven with it, that they have drawn that respect to themselves which is only

The History of Oracles.

4

only due to the true Religion; and we dare not find fault with the one for fear of attacking at the same time fomething that is holy in the Other. I do not reproach this excess of Religion in those that are capable of discerning, but rather praise it; yet whatever Commendations they may deserve, we cannot but confess that a just medium is much the safest course; and that it is more reasonable to remove error from truth. than to venerate error because it is mix'd with truth. Christianity has been alwaies able to stand of its self without false proofs; but it is at present rendred more fo than ever, by the pains the great Men of this Age have taken to Establishit on true foundation ons with greater Power and force than ever the Ancients did: and we ought to be fill'd with so just a confidence of our Religion as to reject all false advantages, tho they may be use ful to a weaker party. Having laid this foundation I advance boldly to prove that Oracles, of what nature for ever, were not deliver'd by Dæmons,

The History of Oracles.

and that they did not cease at the coming of Jesus Christ. Each of which points deserves a particular discourse.

THE

FIRST DISCOURSE.

That Oracles were not given by Dx= mons.

mons, evil Genii, and Spirits condemn'd to eternal Punishment. Religion teaches us that; and if so, then our reason must tell us that these Dæmons might have animated Statues, and delivered Oracles, if God had permitted them so to do. We are therefore only to inquire whether they had such a permission or not.

'Tis only then a matter of fact which is in dispute; and this matter of fact depending wholly on the will of God, it is certain that it would have been revealed to us, if the

B 3 know-

and

The History of Oracles.

6

knowledge thereof were necessary. But the Holy Scriptures do not teach us any where that Oracles were deliver'd by Dæmons; and therefore we are at liberty to choose which side we will take in this matter; for it is of the number of those things that the Divine Wisdom has thought sit to leave to our own decision.

Now it is agreed on by the whole World, that there was fomething supernatural in Oracles; the reason of which is eafily found, as to what regards the present Age: For since it was believ'd in the first Ages of Christianity that Oracles were deliver'd by Dæmons, this seems a sufficient cause for us to believe it now; for whatever was the opinion of the Ancients, good or bad, it was alwaies favourably received; and what they themselves cou'd not prove by sufficient Reasons, is in our days prov'd by their Authority alone. If they forefaw this, they did very well not to give themselves the trouble of reaforing too nicely. But let us inquire after the reasons which obliged the Primi-

The History of Oracles.

Primitive Christians to believe that Oracles had fomething supernatural in 'em, and we shall afterwards try whether they were found and folid, or not.

CHAP. I.

The first Reason why the Primitive Christians believed that Oracles were delivered by Dæmons, and the surprizing Histories that were publish'd concerning Oracles and Genii.

Ntiquity is full of abundance of wonderful Histories and Oracles, which, as it is believ'd, must needs be attributed to spirits: I will relate some few examples, which shall serve for a taste of what the rest were.

All the World knows what happen'd to the Pilot Thamus: His Ship being one evening near certain Islands in the Ægean Sea, the Winds were

hush'd

hush'd on a suddain, and the Waves ceas'd their motion: all the Passen. gers were awake, and the greatest part of 'em passing their time in drinking one with another, when on a suddain they heard a Voice which came from the Islands, and call'd aloud, Thamus. Thamus fuffer'd himself to be call'd thrice before he return'd an answer, and then the Voice commanded him, that when he did arrive at a certain place, he should cry out, That the great Pan was dead. There was not a Man in the Ship who was not seiz'd with fear and dread at these words, and they all confulted whether Thamus ought to obey the Voice or not; but Thamus resolv'd that if when they were arrived at the appointed Place, there were Wind enough to Sail onwards, he would pass by without faying any thing; but if a calm happen'd to keep him there, he then would acquit himself of the order he had receiv'd. And fo finding himself to be surpriz'd with a Calm in that very place, he cry'd out with all his force, That the Great Pan was dead.

dead. Scarce had he given over speaking, but they heard from every fide Groans and Complaints as of a great multitude surpriz'd and Afflicted at this news. All those who were in the Ship were witnesses of this Accident; the Fame of which spread it self in a little time, as far as Rome; and the Emperor Tiberius having a desire to see Thamus himself, assembled a great number of Pagan Priests to know of them who this great Pan was, and it was concluded that he was the Son of Mercury and Penelope. Thus in Plutarch's Dialogues (where he treats of the Cessation of Oracles ) Cleombrotus tells this story, and says he had it of Epithersis his Grammar-Master, who was in the Ship with Thamus when this wonder happen'd.

Thulis was a King of Egypt, whose Suidas. Empire extended it self as far as the Ocean: It is he who (as they said) gave the Name of Thule to the Isle now called Iseland. His Empire reaching thither was of a large extent, and the King pussed up with Pridelat his Success and Prosperity went to the Oracle of Serapis, and thus he spake to it: Thou that art the God of Fire, and who governest the Course of the Heavens, tell me the Truth: Was there ever, or will there ever be one so Puissant as my self?

his

The Oracle auswered him thus.

First God, then the Word and Spirit, all-uniting in one, whose Power can never end. Go hence immediately, O Mortal, whose Life is always uncertain. And Thulis at his going thence had his Throat cut.

Eusebius has collected from the Wrtings of Porphyrius these following Oracles.

1. Groan ye Tripodes, Apollo leaves you; he is forced to leave you by a Celestial Light. Jupiter has been, is, and ever will be: Oh great Jupiter! Alas! My famous Oracles are no more.

2. The Voice can return no more to the Priestess, she is condemn'd to Silence.

The History of Oracles.

lence. Make such Sacrifices to Apollo, as are worthy of a God.

3. Unhappy Priest, (faid Apollo to one of his Priests, ) Interrogate me no more concerning the Holy Father. his only Son, nor the Spirit which is the Soul of all things: It is this Spirit that chases me for ever from these Abodes.

Augustus now grown old, and de-Suidas, Nifigning to choose a Successor, went Cedronus. to consult the Oracle of Delphos. The Oracle returned no Answer, although Augustus spared no Sacrifice; but in the End he drew from it this following:

The Hebrew Infant, to whom all the Gods pay Obedience, chases me hence and sends me into Hell. Therefore quit this Temple without speaking any more.

It is easie to see that upon the Credit of fuch like Histories they ground their Opinion, who say, that Dæmons employed themselves in pronouncing Oracles. This great Pan (who died in the Reign of Tiberius, as well as Fesus Christ) is the Master

and

The History of Oracles.

visible, that God forced Dæmons to bear Witness to the Truth? Besides, why did the Oracles cease; if they were only deliver'd by Priests?

and Prince of the Dæmons, whose Empire was ruined by the Death of a God so saving to the Universe: Or, if this Explanation do not please you, (for I hope we may without Impiety give different Solutions of the same thing, although it be of a religious concern) this great Pan was Jesus Christ himself: Whose Death caused so general a Grief and Consternation among the Dæmons, who from that time could no more exercise their Tyranny over Mankind: Thus a way has been found out to give a double account who this great Pan was.

Could the Oracle delivered to King Thulis (an Oracle so positive concerning the Holy Trinity) be a humane Fiction? How could the Priest of Serapis have divined fo great a Mystery, unknown then to all the World, and even to the Jews themfelves ?

If these Oracles were delivered by Priests, who were Impostors, what could oblige them to discredit themfelves, and publish the Cessation of their own gainful Oracles? Is it not visible,

CHAP. II.

The Second Reason why the Primitive Christians believed that Oracles were supernatural, and the Agreement of this Opinion with the System of Christianity.

THAT there are Dæmons being • once allowed by Christianity, it was natural and easie enough to attribute to them the Ability of performing any thing that is Great and Wonderful, and not to refuse them the Power of delivering Oracles, and effecting any other Pagan Miracles, which seemed to have need of their Assistance. And thus the Ancients faved themselves the trouble of en-

tring

tring into a strict enquiry about Matters which would be tedious and difficult: For all that was surprizing and extraordinary, was without any unone ado ascribed to these Dæmons: And this alone they thought a sufficient Confirmation of their Existence, and of the Religion it self that warranted

Moreover, it is certain, that about the time of the Birth of Fefir Christ, there is when mention made of the Cessation of Oracles even in Prophane Authors. Now, why this time rather than any other, was defined for the Celletion of them is very eafily made out, according to the System of the Chri-Itian Religion. God had cholen his People out of the Fewish Nation, and left the Empire of the rest of the World to Damous till the coming of his Son; but then, he deprived them of that Power, which before he permitted them to have: His Will then was, that all should submit themselves to Fesus Christ; and that nothing should hinder the Establishment of his Kingdom over all the World. There is such a fort of Happiness in this Thought, that I do not wonder it has made so great a Progress. This is one of those things to the truth of which we so easily accord, and which perswaded us, because we are willing to believe.

The History of Oracles.

CHAP. III.

The Third Reason of the Primitive Christians, taken from the Agreement of their Opinion with the Philosophy of Plato.

La-mode, as that of Plato during the First Ages of the Church: The Pagans interested themselves amongstall the different Sects of Philosophers, but the Conformity which Plato's was found to have with Religion, made almost all the knowing Christians Christians of that Sect. Thence came the mighty Esteem they had of Plato: They looked upon him as a fort of Prophet who had fore-told many important Points of Christianity, especially that of the Holy Trinity; (which we cannot deny to be clearly, enough contained in his Writings: Nay, they went fo far as to take his Works for Comments on the Scripture; and to conceive the Nature of the Word, as he conceived it. He represented God so elevated above his Creatures, that he did not believe that they were immediately made by his Hands; and therefore he put between them and him this Word, as a degree. by which the Actions of God might pass down to them: The Christians had the like Idea of Fesus Christ: And this may perhaps be the Reason why no Heresie has been more generally received and maintained with greater heat than Arrianism.

This Platonism then (which seems, to Honour the Christian Religion by countenancing it) was very sull of Notions about Dæmons: And thence thence they easily pass'd into that Opinion which the old Christians had of Oracles.

The History of Oracles.

Plato said, that Dæmons were of a middle Nature, between God and Man; that they were the aerial Genii appointed to hold a Commerce, between God and us; that althothey were near us, yet we could not fee them; that they penetrated into all our Thoughts; that they had a Love for the Good, and a Hatred for the Bad; and that it was for their Honour that such variety of Sacrifices, and so many different Ceremonies were appointed: But it does not at all appear, that Plato acknowledged any evil Dæmons, to which might be attributed the management of the llusions of Oracles. Plutarch, notwithstanding, assures us, that Plato was not ignorant of them; and amongst he Platonical Philosophers, the thing s out of doubt. * Eusebius in his E-*Dialogues vangelical Preparations, recites a great of the cea-lumber of Passages out of Porphyri-racles, Lib. s, where that Pagan Philosopher as-4,5,6. ures us, that evil Dæmons are the Authors'

three

Authors of Enchantments, Philtres and Witch-Crafts; that they cheat our Eyes with Spectres, Fantoms, and Apparitions; that lying is Es fential to their Nature; that they raise in us the greatest part of our Passions: and that they have an Ambition to pass with us for Gods; that their aerial and spiritual Bodies are nourished with Suffumigations, and with the Blood and Fat of Sacrifices: and that 'tis only these that imploy themselves in giving Oracles, and to whom this Task fo full of Fraudis assign'd: in short at the Head of this Troop of evil Dæmons he places Hecate and Serapis.

Tertullian in his Apologies.

famblichus, another Platonist, has faid as much. And the greatest part of these things being true, the Christians received them all with Joy, and have added to them besides a little of their own: As for Example, that the Dæmons stole from the Writings of the Prophets some Knowledge of things to come; and so got Honour by it in their Oracles.

The History of Oracles. This System of the ancient Christiins had this Advantage, that it difovered to the Pagans by their own Principles, the Original of their false Worship, and the Source of those Erors which they always embraced. They were perswaded that there was omething supernatural in their Orales; and the Christians, who were lways disputing against them, did ot desire to confute this Opinion. Thus by Dæmons (which both Paries believed to be concerned in the Oacles,)they explicated all that was fuernatural in them. They acknowedged indeed that this fort of ordinay Miracles were wrought in the Paan Religion; but then they ruined his Advantage again, by imputing hem to such Authors as evil Spirits. nd this way of convincing, was ore short and easie, than to conadict the Miracle it felf, by a long rain of Enquiries and Arguments. hus I have given you the manner bw that Opinion which the first Aes of the Church had of the Pagan racles, was grounded, I might to the three Reasons, which I have already brought, add a fourth of no less Authority perhaps than those: That is, That in the Supposition of Oracles being given by Dæmons, there is something miraculous: And if we consider the humor of Mankind a little, we shall find how much we are taken with any thing that is Miraculous. But I do not intend to enlarge my self on this Reslection; for those that think upon it, will easily believe me, and those that do not, will perhaps give it no credit, notwithstand ing all my Arguments.

Let us now examine the feveral Reasons which Men have had to be lieve Oracles to be Supernatural.

CHAP. IV.

That the surprizing Histories of Oracles ought to be suspected.

IT is very difficult to give an Account of those Stories and Oracles which

The History of Oracles.

which we have mentioned, without having Recourse to Dæmons. But the Question is, Whether they be true? Let us be assured of the Matter of Fact, before we trouble our selves with enquiring into the Cause. It is true, that this Method is too slow and dull for the greatest part of Mankind, who run naturally to the Cause, and pass over the truth of the matter of Fact; but for my part, I will not be so ridiculous as to find out a Cause for what is not.

This kind of Misfortune happened o pleasantly at the end of the last age, to some Learned Germans, that cannot forbear speaking of it. "In the Year 1593, there was a Report that the Teeth of a Child of Silesia of seven Years old, dropp'd out, and that one of Gold came in the Place of one of his great Teeth-Horstius, a Physician in the University of Helmstad, wrote in the Year 1595 the History of this Tooth, and pretends that it was partly natural, and partly miraculous, and that it was sent from God espe-

" to this Infant, to comfort the Chri. " flians who were then afflicted by "the Turks. Now fansie to your felf what a Consolationthis was, and what this Tooth could fignifie, either to the Christians or the Turks. In the same Year (that this Tooth might not want for Historians) one Relandus wrote a Book of it: Two Years after, Ingolsteterus, another Learned Man, wrote against the Opinion of Rolandus concerning this golden Tooth; and Rolandus presently makes a Learned Reply. Another Great Man, named Libavius, collected all that had been faid of this Tooth, to which he added his own Opinion. In fine there wanted no thing to so many samous Works, but only the truth of its being a golden Tooth. For when a Gold-Smith had examined it, he found, that it was only a thin Plate of Gold fixed to the Tooth with a great deal of Art Thus they first went about to com. pile Books, and afterwards they confulted the Gold-Smith.

The History of Oracles.

Nothing is more natural than to do the fame thing in all other cases. And I am not so convinc'd of our Ignorance by the things that are, and of which the Reasons are unknown, as by those which are not, and for which we yet find out Reasons. That is to say, as we want those Principles that lead us to truth, so we have those which agree exceeding well with error and falsehood.

Some Learned Physicians have found out the reason why Places under Ground are hot in the Winter and cool in the Summer; and greater Physicians have since discover'd that they are not so.

Historical Enquiries are much more liable to this error. For when we argue from what is said in History, what assurances have we that these Historians have never been by assed, nor credulous, nor misinform'd, nor negligent? 'Tis necessary therefore that we should look out for one, that has been an Eye-witness of all those things of which he writes, unconcern'd by Interest, and diligent. But especially when Men write of such matters of Fact, as have a Relation to Religion, it is very hard not to savour (according to the party of which they are) a salse Religion with those advantages that are not due to it; or not to give a true one those salse assistances of which it has no need. And yet we may be assured that we can never add more truth to what is true already, nor make that true which is salse.

Nothing

Some Christians in the first Age, for want of having keen convinced of this, Maxim have suffer'd themselves, in favour of Christianity, to introduce suppositions bold enough, which the founder part of Christians have been fain afterwards to disown. This Inconsiderate zeal has produc'da great number of Apocryphal Books, to which were given the Names of Pagan or Jewish Authors; for the Church, having to do with these two forts of Enemies, what was more advantageous to her than to fight em with their own Weapons, by producing Books, which, tho' made, as was pretended, by their own parry were written nevertheless very much in favour of Christianity? But whilst they strained the point too far, todraw from those counterfeit works some very great benefit to their Religion, they gained none at all; for the clearness of the manner in which they were written, betray'd them; and our Mysteries are therein so plainly unfolded, that the Prophets of the Old and New Testament understood nothing in comparison of those Fewish and Pagan Authors. And which way foever Men turn themselves to fave the reputation of those Books, they will find in their too great clearness a difficulty not to be surmounted. If some Christians fathered spurious Books on Pagans and Jews, Hereticks found the way of doing the like on the Orthodox. There was nothing to be met with but false Gospels, salse Epistles of the Apostles, and false Histories of their Lives; and nothing but an effect of the Divine Providence could have separated the truth from so many Apocryphal Works, as confounded it. Some

Some great Men of the Church have fometimes been deceived either by the spurious works of Hereticks fathered upon the Orthodox, or by what the Christians father upon the Fews; but oftenest by the latter: For they seldom examine strictly enough that which feems favourable to Religion; the heat with which they contest for so good a Cause, not giving them the leifure to make a good Choice of their Weapons. This is the reason that they have hapned fometimes to make use of the Books of the Sibyls or of those of Hermes Trismegistus King of Egypt.

We do not intend by this to weaken the Authority, or to lessen the Me rit of those great Men. For after we shall have examin'd all the errors, (into which perhaps they have fallen on some certain subjects,) there will yet remaine abundance of solid Reasonings, and very curious discoveries, which are worthy of our highest Admiration. And if, with the true proofs of our Religion, they have lest us others which may be suspected, it is our part to receive that only which is legitimate; and to pardon their zeal, who have furnish'd us with more proofsthan there was any necessity for.

I am not at all surpriz'd that this same Zeal has convinced 'em of the truth of I know not how many Oracles, advantageous to their Religion, which passed for currant in the first Ages of the Church. The Authors of the Books of the Sibyls, and those of Hermes Trismegistus, were also probably the Authors of these Oracles; at least it was more easie to seign them, than to counterfeit intire Volumes. The History of Thamus is Originally heathen, and yet Eusebius and other great Authors have given it the Reputation of being believed. It is immediately followed in Plutarch with a Relation fo ridiculous, that it will be fufficient wholly to discredit the other. For Demetrius saies there, that the most part of the Islands near England are desert and Consecrated to Dæmons and Heroes, and that he, being fent by the Emperor to discover these Islands, chanced to land upon one of those that were Peopled, and that, a little time after his Arrival, there happen'da Tempest and terrible claps of Thunder and Lightning, which made the People of the Country conclude that some one of their Principal Dæmons was dead; because their Death's were alwaies attended with fomething strange and horrible To this Demetrius adds, that one of those Islands was the Prison of Saturn who was kept there by Briareus, and was Buried in a Profound fleep (which methinks should render the custody of the Giant very needless) incompass'd with an infinite number of Da: mons lying at his feet as slaves.

Has not Demetrius made a very curious Relation of this Voyage? And is it not pleasant to see such a Philosopher as Plutarch coldly relate to us such Wonderful things? It is not without reason that Herodotus is esseemed the father of History; and all the Greek Writers of that kind are on that account his offspring, and partake of his Genius. They have somewhat of truth, but more of wonderful and amusing stories. But let it be how it will, it were sufficient almost to resute the History of Thamus (tho it had no other desect) to have been found in the same Treatise with the Dæmons of Demetrius.

But besides this, it cannot receive a reasonable interpretation. For if the Great God Pan were a Dæmon, could not the Dæmons have fent one another an account of one of their Deaths, without employing Thamus to that end? Have they no other way of informing one another of news? And, on the other fide, can they be so imprudent as to discover to Men their Misfortunes and the weakness of their Natures ? God compell'd 'em, perhaps, you will fay. Then God had fome design in doing so; But let us see what follow'd thereupon; there was no Person that was converted from Paganism by having heard of the Death of the great God Pan. It was declared that he was the Son of Mercury and Penelope, and that it was not he that was acknowledg'd in A cadia for supream God of all (as his Name

ful

Name imports;) and therefore tho the voice had named him the great Pan, yet he was understood to be but the little Pan, whose Death was of no great consequence, and there did not appearany considerable regret for it.

The History of Oracles.

If this great Pan were Jesus Christ, the Dæmons would not have told to Men news of a death fo much to their advantage, unless God had compell'd'em to it. But what's the effect of all this? did any one understand the Name of Pan, in its true fence? Plut arch: liv'd in the fecond Age of the Church, and yet no Person then knew that Pan was Jesus Christ, who died in Judea.

The History of Thulis is related by Suidas (an Author who heaps up a great many things, perphaps ill enough chosen) His Oracle of Serapis is reproach'd with the same fault, as the Books of the Sibyls; that is, of being too clear concerning our Mysteries. And farther, we are certain that this Thulis King of Egypt was not one of the Ptolomyes; and what then then will become of the whole Oracle, if Serapis were a God first brought into Egypt by a Ptolomy, who sent for him out of Pontus, as many Learned Men pretend from very strange probabilities? at least it is certhe that Herodotus, who has written to plentifully about old Egypt, does not mention Serapis, and that Tacitus recounts at length how and why one of the Ptolomyes brought from Pontus the God Serapis, that was then known no where elfe.

The Oracle, said to be given to Augustus concerning the Hebrew Child, is by no means to be reciev'd. Gedrenus cites Eusebius for it; but at this day there is no fuch thing to be found there. It is not impossible that Cedrenus should make a false Citation, or should cite some work not rightly attributed to Eusebius. He has thought fit to relate upon the credit of certain counterfeit Histories of St. Peter, which pass'd for current in his time, That Simon the Magician had at his door a great Dog, which devour'd all those that his Master would not have enter; and that St. Petercoming thither to speak with Simon, commanded the Dog to go and tell his Master in Humane Language, That Peter the servant of God, would speak with him: The Dog went and performed that Command, to great Amazement of fuch as well then with Simon. But Simon, to shew that he could do as much as St. Peter. bid the Dog go and tell him, That he might Enter: which the Dog immediately did. Hence you may fee what it is that the Greeks call writing of History. Cedrenus lived in an ignorant Age, when the liberty of writing Fables was joined with the General inclination of the Greeks towards'em.

nct

The History of Oracles.

But tho' Eusebius, in some work of his, which has not come down to us, had effectually spoke of the Oracle of Augustus, vet we find Eusebius himself is sometimes deceived; of which there are good proofs. The first Defenders of Christianity, Justin, Tertullian, Theophilus, Tatian, would they have said nothing of an Oracle fo much in Favour of their Religion? Had they so little Zeal as to neglect a thing of fuch Advantage? but even * those that give us this Ora- * Credele, spoil it by adding, that Augustus nus, Suin his Return to Rome, built in the ceph. Capitol an Altar with this Inscription, This is the Altar of the only son (or Eldest Son) of God. Where had he the Idea of this only Son of God, of which the Oracle makes no nention? In short, that which is! nost observable, is, that Augustus aser the Voyage he made into Greece, incteen Years before the Birth of Jeus Christ, never returned to Rome; ut allowing that he did, he was not hen in an Humor to erect Altars to ny God but himsels: For he suffered ot only the * Asian Maids to raise A!- * Taciens, irs to him, and celebrate holy Games Dion Cas his Honour; but also at Rome sius. ney consecrated one to Fortune Reerning, Fortunæ reduci, that was. fay, to himself, and they were to eep the day of his happy return as a estival.

the History of Oracles.

The Oracles, which Eusebius relates out of Porphyrius, appear harder to make out than all the rest: for Eusebius would not have charged Porphyrius with Oracles of which he made no mention, and Porphyrius, who was so addicted to Paganism, would not have cited false Oracles (concerning the Cessation of Oracles themselves) to the Advantage of the Christian Religion: For in this Case, it feems, that the Testimony of an Enemy has a great deal of Creditand Force.

But on the other side, Porphyrim was not so unskilful a Man, as to furnish the Christians with Weapons against Paganism, without being no cessarily engaged to it by the Conse quence of some Reasons, which don not in this matter appear to be his Case. If these Oracles had been al been much to be relied on.

The History of Oracles.

But it is out of Porphyrius himfelf that the Christians (as it appears by the Example of Eusebius) pretend to fetch these Oracles; it seems, that Porphyrius takes Pleasure to ruin his own Religion, and to establish another. The Truth is, this is suspicious of it self, and yet it becomes more so, by his pushing the thing so far; for they tell us from him of I know not how many Oracles most clear and most positive, concerning the Person of Jesus Christ, concerning his Resurrection and Ascension. In fine, the most resolute, and knowing amongst the Pagans hath loaded us with Proofs of Christianity; we may well fuspect so great a piece of Generofity.

Eusebius believed it a very great Advantage to be able to place Porphyrius at the Head of a Multitude of ledged by the Christians, and Portagles so favourable to Religion; phyrius owning that they were esse and he gives them us stripp'd of what Aually given, had denied the Conserver accompanies them, in the Wrifequences drawn from them, it is tings of Porphyrius! How do we certain that they would have the know, but that he did refute them? According to the Interest of his Cause,

he

37

The History of Oracles.

he ought to have done it; and if he did not do it, certainly he had some hidden Intention.

It is to be suspected, that Porphyrius was wicked enough to frame salse Oracles, and present them to Christians, with a Design of making Sport with their Credulity, if they should receive them for true, and endeavour to strengthen their Religion by such like props: And then he would have drawn thence such Consequences as would be of greater Importance than these Oracles, and with this instance have attacked the whole Religion. However at the botom this would have been but a frivolous Argument.

Tis very certain, that this same Porphyrius (who surnisheth us with all these Oracles) held, (as we have seen) that they were delivered by lying Spirits; it may very well then be imagined, that he hath put into Oracles all the Mysteries of our Religion, endeavouring to destroy it by rendring it suspected of Forgery, as depending on the Testimony of false false Witnesses: I know the Christians did not take it so; yet seeing they could never prove by any Argument, that the Damons were fometimes forced to speak the Truth, Porphyrius was always in a condition to make use of his Oracles against them. And therefore (if we take the Matter right) their better way had been to have denied, that there were everany Oracles, as wedo at this prefent. This appears to me to be a sufficient Reason, why Porphyrius was fo prodigal of Oracles, that were fo favourable to our Religion. But what would have been the Success of the great debate between the Christians and Infidels, we can only conjecture; for all the written pieces of their Difputes are not come to our Hands. Thus in examining things a little clofer than ordinary, we find that the Oracles, which were reckoned fuch Wonders, never were at all; of which, I shall not need to give any more Instances, all the rest being of the same Nature.

D<sub>3</sub> CHAP.

CHAP. V.

That the common Opinion concerning Oracles does not agree so well as 'tis imagin'd with the Christian Religion.

THE filence of the Scriptures concerning these evil Damons, (which are Pretended to be the managers of Oracles) hath not only left us at liberty to believe nothing of 'em, but it obliges us to believe the contrary; for can it be possible that the Scriptures should not have instructed the Jews and Christians in a thing which it so extremely imported them to know, (and which they cou'd never have found out by their natural Reason) to the end that they might not be shaken in their own Religion, by seeing things so surprising in another. For I conceive that God spake not to Man, but to supply the weakness ness of his understanding, which of it self was not sufficient to guide him; and that whatsoever he has not declar'd to him, is either of such a nature that he may learn it by himself, or else God does not think it necessary that he should know it. So if the Oracles had been deliver'd by evil Dæmons, God would have made it known to us, to have prevented us from believing that he himself deliver'd 'em, or that there was something Divine in salse Religions.

David reproached the Infidels with Gods that had mouths and spake not, and wishes that their Adorers, for a punishment, might become like those they Ador'd; but if these Gods had not only the use of Speech, but also the knowledge of things to come, I see no reason David had thus to reproach the Infidels, nor ought they to have been angry for having been resembled to their Gods. When the Holy Fathers inveighed with so much reason against the Worship of Idols, they alwaies argu'd from the impotency of 'em; but if they had Spor spoken, if they had predicted things to come, then they ought not to have treated them with fuch contempton the account of their impotency, but Thou'd rather have disabus'd the People, and have confess'd the wonderous Power that was in 'em: In fine, could they be so mightly mistaken who ador'd what they believed was animated by a Divine vertue, or at least a vertue more than humane. 'Tis true, you'll say, that these Dæmons were enemies of God, but how cou'd the Heathens Divine that? Because Demons required ceremonies that were Barbarous and extravagant, the Pagans themselves believ'd 'em santaflical and cruel, but nevertheless they believ'd 'em môre powerful than Men; nor did they know that the true God offer'd 'em his protection against them. They did for the most part submit themselves to their Gods as to dreaded enemies who were to be appealed at any Price; nor had this submission and fear been quite without Reason, if so be that in effect Dæmens did give some proof of their power over nature. In fine, Paganism (tho a Worship abominable in the sight of God) would have been but an involuntary and excusable error.

41

Power

But you will say, if the crafty Priests made it their business to impose upon the People, then Paganism was no more but a simple error into which the credulous fell, whilst their honest and downright intention was to Honour a superior being.

But the case is much otherwise; for it behoves Men to precaution themfelves against errors, into which other Men may lead'em; but there is no possibility of fore-arming themselves against those errors into which they may be led by Genii, or Dæmons which are above themselves. The light of my Reason is sufficient to examine whether a statue speaks or does not, but in the moment that it does speak, nothing can perswade me against the Divinity which I attribute to it. In a word, God is oblig'd by the Laws of his Bounty to protect me from those surprises from which I cannot defend my felf; but as for other things, it belongs to my reason to do its office.

The History of Oracles.

We see also that when God permitted the Dæmons to work prodigies, he at the same time confounded them by working miracles far great ter. Pharaoh might be deceived by the Magicians, but Moses was still more powerful than the Magicians of Pharaoh. The Dæmons never had more power or did more furprizing things than in the time of Jesus Christ and the Apostles. This hinders not, but that Paganism with justice hath been alwaies called the worship of Da which is taken therein of the Divinity, does not at all agree with the true nally unhappy Genii.

Secondly, the design of the Heathens was not fo much to adore the anger and caprice they stood in feat. In fine, the Dæmons, (who have with out contradiction the power of temp ountenanced as much as ever they ould the gross errors of the Pagans, nd made 'em blind to impostures, which were notoriously visible. From nence it is said that Paganism was not born up by the Miracles, but by he Artifices of Dæmons; which supposes that in whatever they did here was nothing of reality or truth, nor of fuch force as effectually to make a Statue speak.

COUL!

Nevertheless, it may be that God has fometimes permitted the Dæmons to animate Idols; but if this ever happen'd, God had his peculiar mons. For in the first place the Idu reasons for it, which are alwaies worthy of profound veneration; But generally speaking, there has never God, but with the reprobate and eter- been any fuch thing. God permitted the Devil to burn the Houses of Job, and lay his Pastures desolate; to cause Ill his Oxen and Sheep to Die, to first Being which is the source of all trike his Body with a thousand good, but those ill Beings of whole wounds, but it must not therefore be aid that the Devil is let loose on all those to whom such misfortunes happen. When there is a discourse about ting Men and laying snares for 'em) many Man's being sick or ruin'd we never think that the Devil is concern in it. The case of Job is a par ticular case; we argue Indepen dantly of it, and our general reals ning never excludes the exception that the Almighty power of God can make in all things.

ver

'Tis apparent then that the com mon opinion concerning Oracles, does not very well agree with the bounty of God, and that it discharges Paganism of the greatest Part of the extravagances and Abomination which the Holy Fathers alwain was no wonder, that they shou'd o bey those which animated Statues and performed every day a thousand extraordinary things; and therefore the Christians to take from them all excuse, ought never to have yielded em this Point. If all the Pagan Re ligion were no other than the cheats of Priests, Christians took advantage of the excess of ridiculousness into which the Pagans fell.

Besides, is there any great appear rance

The History of Oracles.

ince that the disputes between the bristians and Pagans was in that ate, seeing Porphyrius confesses with much willingness, that the Oracles vere delivered by evil Dæmons? Of hese evil Dæmons he made a double. se: He made use of 'em ( as we ave already seen ) to render those pracles unprofitable and disadvantaeous to the Christian Religion, which he Christians thought were on their ide; and besides he imputed all the follies and Barbarities of an infinite number of facrifices, which without found in it. The Pagans might have ceasing they reproach'd the Pagans said in their own justification, that withal, to these cunning and cruel Genii. We then attack Porphyrius even in his last retrenchments, and affert the true interest of Chri-Stianity, by undertaking to prove that Dæmons were not the Authors of Oracles.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

That Dæmons are not sufficiently established by Platonism.

In the first Ages, Poetry and Philosophy were the same thing, and all Wisdom was contained in Verse. Nor we stry more credited by this Alliance, but Philosophy was less. Homer and Hesiod were the first Grecian Philosophers; and thence it is that all other Philosophers, have had in very great Estimation what ever they said, and have never cited them but with great Honour.

Homer very often confounds together the Gods and Dæmons: But Hesiod distinguishes four species or kinds of reasonable Natures, viz. the Gods, the Dæmons, the Demy-Gods or Heroes, and Men. Nay, he goes farther yet, and notes the Duration of the Lives of Dæmons: For the Nymphs,

The History of Oracles.
of which he speaks in the Place I am of which he speaks in the Place 1 am going to cite, are these Dæmons, and Plutarch understands them so.

A Crow, (fays Hefiod) lives nine times as long as a Man, a Stag four times as long as a Crow, a Raven three times as long as a Stag, the Phænix nine times as long as a Raven; and in fine the Nymphs ten times as long as the Phænix. One would take this Calculation for no other than a mere Poetick Fancy, unworthy the Reflections of a Philosopher, or the imitation of a Poet; for there is in it neither agreeableness nor truth: But Plutarch is not of this Opinion; for he finds, that supposing the Life of Man to be seventy Years, (which is its ordinary Duration,) the Dæmons then ought to live fix hundred and eighty thousand, and four hundred Years: And not conceiving how any Experiment of this so long Life of the Dæmons can be made, he rather believes that Hesiod by the Age of Man, understands but one Tear. The Interpretation is not very natural; but according to this Estimation; the Life Life of the Dæmons is not above nine thousand, seven hundred and twenty Years, and then Plutarch had not much Trouble to find out how Dæmons could live solong. And besides, he remarks in the Number of nine thousand, seven hundred and twenty Years, certain Pythagorean Perfections, which render it altogether worthy to design the Term of the Lives of Dæmons. Such as these are the boasted reasonings of Antiquity. From the Poems of Homer and Hefied, the Damons passed into the Philosophy of Plato, who can never be too much commended, since 'tis he of all the Greeks, who has conceived the highest Idea of God; tho even that plunged him in false Notions. For, because God is infinitely elevated above Men, he believed that there ought to be placed between him and us, a kind of middle Beings, which should cause a Communication of two Extremes fo far diftant, by the means of which, the Operations of the Deity might be brought down to us. God (lays he) refembles

The History of Oracles.

bles a Triangle, which has three Sides equal, the Dæmons are like a Triangle that has but two Sides equal, and Men are like a Triangle which has all three Sides unequal.

This Idea is well enough fanfied, and there is nothing wanting but something of Solidity to support it.

But after all (may it be faid) has not Plato reasoned justly? And do not we know for certain by the Holy Scriptures, that there are Genti, Ministers of the Will of God and his Messengers to Men? Is it not wonderful that Plato should discover this, only by the Light of his natural Reason?

I confess, that Plato has conjectured aright; nevertheless, I blame him for his Conjecture. Divine Revelation assures us of the Existence of Angels and Dæmons, but it is not within the Sphere of humane Reason to assure us of it. He knows not what to make of the infinite space which is between God and Man, and therefore he fills it with Genii and Dæmons: But with what shall that infinite space be fill'd, which is between God and these Genii or Dæmons themselves? For the distance between God and any Creature what soever, is infinite. And if the Actions and Will of God must traverse, as one may say, this Infinite Vacuum to go to the Dæmons, they may as well reach even to Men, fince they are farther off but by very few degrees, which bear no Proportion to the first great distance. When God treats with Men by the Ministry of Angels, 'tis not to be understood that Angels are necessary for this Communication (as Plato pretends;) God emploies them for Reafons, into which Philosophy can never penetrate, and which can never be perfectly known but by himself.

According to that Idea, which the Comparison of the Triangle gives us, we find that Plato framed this Notion of Dæmons, to the end we might mount from one Creature, to a nother Creature more perfect, till at length we arriv'd at God himself. So that God would have but some degrees of Perfection more than the highest highest Creature; but it is visible, that as they are all infinitely Imperfect in refpect of him, because they are all infinitely distant from him; so the Differences of Perfection, which are between the Creatures, vanish as soon as they are compared with God; for what elevates them one above another does not at all bear any proportion to him.

The History of Oracles.

And if we confult nothing but humane Reason, there is no need of Spirits to make the Actions of God communicable to Men, nor of placing between God and us any thing that ipproaches him nearer than we do.

And perhaps Plato himself was not so sure of the Existence of his Danons, as the Platonists have fince That which makes me fufeen. pest this, is, That he places Love in he Number of the Dæmons, (for he ften mixes Gallantry with Philosoby, and his Talent is not mean on ubjects of that Nature.) He fays, hat Love is the Son of the God of liches, and the Goddess of Poverty: rom his Father he holds, his greatess of Courage, his Elevation of thought,

thought, his Inclination to give, his Prodigality and his Confidence in his Strength, his good Opinion of his own Merit, and Desire to have always the Preference. But, on the otherside, he holds from his Mother that Indigence, which makes him always asking, that Importunity with which he asks, that Timidity and Bashfulness, which hinders him often times from daring to ask, that Disposition which he has to Servitude, and that Fear of being despifed, which he can never lofe. This, in my Opinion, is one of the prettiest Fables that was ever made. It is pleafant to find Plato sometimes writing Amours as fost and agreeable as Anacreon could himself have done. This Description of the Pedegree of Love extremely well fets forth all the fantasticalness of his Nature: But we know not what to make of Dæmons, if Love must pass for one.

There is no appearance that Plate understood this in a natural and Philosophical Sence, nor that he could say, Love was a Being out of us, or extrinsecal.

The History of Oracles.

extrinsecal, which inhabits the Air: Certainly, he means this only as a Gallantry, and then it must be permitted me to believe, that all his Dæmons are of the same kind with Love. And that, since he mingles Fables with his System, he cares not much, if the rest of his System pass for a Fable. Hitherto we have only answered the Reasons, that made Men believe Oracles, to have had something in them of Supernatural. Let us now begin more closely to attack this Opinion.

CHHP. VII.

That some Grand Seets of the Pagan Philosophers, did not believe there was any thing Supernatural in Oracles.

IF in the midst of Greece it self, where all places resounded with their Oracles, we had maintained E 3 that that they were but Impostures, no one would have been aftonished with the Boldness of the Paradox; and there would have been no need of taking any Measures, how to vend the Opinion in fecret. For Philofophers were divided about the Subject of Oracles; the Platonists and Stoicks were for them, but the Cynicks, Peripateticks and Epicureans declared highly against them. The Wonders of the Oracles were not so great, but that half the Wife Men of Greece, were still at Liberty to believe nothing of them; and this, notwithstanding the common Prejudices or Bigotry of the Grecians: Which is a very remarkable thing

*. Lib. 4.of vang.Pre-

* Eusebius, tells us of six hundred Heathen Authors, who have writ aparations. gainst the Oracles: But of all these, in my Opinion, Oenomaus, (of whom he makes mention, and of whom he has preserved some Fragments) is one, the Loss of whose Works are to be the most lamented. There is a great deal of Pleasure to be found in those Fragments of his that remain,

main, where Oenomaus, full of his Cynical Liberty, argues upon every Oracle against the God who delivered it, and draws up an Accusation against him. See how he treats the God of Delphos, who in his Answer to Crasus had pronounced these Words:

Cræsus, in passing the River Halis, shall destroy a great Empire.

Which fell out accordingly; for Cræsus passing the River Halis attack'd Cyrus, who (as all the World knows) came thundring upon him, and divested him of his Kingdoms.

Tou boast, (says Denomaus to Apollo) in another Oracle delivered to Crœfus, that you know the Number of the Grains of the Sea Sand; and I suppose, you set a great Value upon your self, because you saw from Delphos, the Tortoise, that Crœsus ordered to be boiled in Lydia, at that very instant; this is a precious Knowledge to be proud of! But when you were consulted, concerning the Success of the War between Croesus and Cyrus, there you were were at a stand. If you can divine what shall happen in time to come, to what purpose do you make use of a manner of speaking which cannot be understooded you not foresee your self that they will not be understoode if you do foresee it, you then take pleasure to make us your sport; if you do not know it, let us inform you that you ought to speak more clearly,

and that you are not understood.

I tell you also, if you have a mind to use an Equivocation, that the Greek words by which you express, that Croc. sus shall destroy a great Empire, are not well chosen, and that they can signify nothing else but a victory of Crocsus over Cyrus. If there be a necessity that things must happen, wherefore dost thou amuse us with thy Ambiguities? what dost thou do at Delphos, (unhappily employ'd as thou art) to sing us useless Prophecies? to what purpose do we make thee so many Sacrifices? what sury possesses what sury possesses.

But Oenomaus is yet more out of humour with the Oracle, which Apollo deliver'd to the Athenians. When Xerxes fell upon Greece with all the

The History of Oracles.

forces of Asia, the Pythian Oracle gave 'em for answer,

"That Minerva Protectress of A"thens endeavour'd all manner of
"waies (but in vain) to appease the "angerof Jupiter; but nevertheless Ju"piter in savour of his Daughter, con"sented to suffer the Athenians to "save themselves in walls of wood;
"and that Salamine shou'd see the "Destruction of many Children dear
"to their Mothers; either when Ce"res shou'd be scattered abroad or
"when she should be gathered in.

Upon this Oenomaus wholly loses his Respect for the God of Delphos.

forces

This combat between the Father and the Daughter, saies he, is very unhandsom for Gods. Tis very pretty there should be in Heaven such contrary interests and inclinations? Jupiter is angry with Athens, he brings down all the forces of Asia against it; but if he could not have ruind it without em, if he had no more Thunder left, if he was reduc'd to borrow foreign forces, how had he it then in his Power to make all the forces of Asia come down against this Town? Tet after this he suffers'em to save themselves in Walls of Wood; on whom then was his Anger to fall? what, on the Stones? Rare Diviner! you know not whom the se Children shall be that Salamine shall see the destruction of, whether Greeks or Persians; it cannot be avoided but they must be either one or t'other Army; and do not you at least know, that we shall soon see you know nothing? you conceal the time of Battel under these Poetical expressions, When Ceres shall be scatter'd, or when she shall be gather'd in. Tou are willing to blind us with this Pompous Language; but does not every body know that a Naval Battel is never fought but either in Seed time or Harvest; doubtless it will not be in Winter. But let what will happen you will get your self off by the means of this Jupiter, whom Minerva endeavours to appease; if the Grecians loose the Battel, Jupiter is then Inexorable; if they gain it, then Jupiter suffer'd him-

himself to be appeas'd. And (Apollo) when you say, let 'em fly to Walls of Wood, you counsel, you do not Devine. I, who know not what Devining is, cou'd have said as much as this, and cou'd have judg'd as well, that the fury of the War wou'd fall upon Athens; and that since the Athenians had Ships, the best thing they cou'd do, was to abandon the Town and betake themselves to the Sea.

Such was the veneration some great sects of the Philosophers had for Oracles, and for those very Gods they thought the Authors of 'Tis very pleasant that all the Pagan Religion was no more than this one Problem of Philosophy; it is necessary to know whether the Gods take care of Men, or not, before the question can be answered, whether we ought to Adore 'em, or neglect 'em; the People have already decided it, and are for Adoration, and nothing is to be seen but Temples and Sacrifices; but great Sects of the Philosophers maintain publickly that that these Sacrifices, these Temples, these Adorations, are as so many fruitless and unprofitable things; and that the Gods are so far from delighting in 'em, that they take no cognizance of 'em. There is scarce a Greek who does not consult the 0-racles concerning his affairs; but this does not prevent their being treated in three great Schools of Philosophy as absolute impostures.

The History of Oracles.

Let me beg leave to carry this reflection a little farther, which may serve to lay more open the Pagan Religion; the Grecians in general had a great deal of Wit, but they were very light, curious, unquiet, and uncapable of moderation in any thing; and, to tell my whole opinion of 'em, they had fo much Wit, that their Reason suffer'd by it. The Romans had quite another Character; they were Solid, Serious, and Industrious, they knew how to pursue a design and could foresee at a great distance the consequences of it. I should not be furpris'd that the Grecians (without thinking of the refult fult of things) shou'd impertinently treat pro and con of every thing; and at the same time that they are making Sacrifices, dispute whether or no these Sacrifices approach the Gods; and confult Oracles without being affur'd whether they are meer Illusions or not. Doubtless the Philofophers concern'd themselves so little in the Government, that they took no care not to shock Religion in their disputes; and perhaps the People had not faith enough in the Philosophers to abandon their Religion or change any thing in it upon their word. In fine, the predominant passion in the Greeks was to discourse on all matters at any rate: yet doubtless it is more astonishing to find that the Romans, and those the ablest amongst them too, and who knew best of what consequence Religion was to politicks, durst publish works that did not only call their Religion in question, but also turn'd it into ridicule. I speak of Cicero, who in his Books of Divination has spar'd nothing of what was most most Sacred at Rome. After he had made it evident enough to his very adversaries, how great a folly 'twas to consult the entrails of Beasts, he drives them at last to this answer. That the Gods, who are Almighty, change these entrails in the very mo. ment of the Sacrifice, to the end that we shou'd by them know their pleafure in things to come. This answer was given by Chrysippus, by Antipater and Possidonius, all great Philofophers and chief of the Party of the Stoicks. Ha! what say you? crys Cicero: the very old Women are not so credulous as you are. Can you believe (says he) that the same Calf has the Liver well dispos'd, if chosen for the Sacrifice by one, and ill dispos'd, if chosen by another? Can this disposition of the Liver be chang'd in an in-Stant, to accomedate it self to the fortune of those that sacrifice? see you not, that it is chance that makes she choice of victims? does not experience tell you so? for it oftentimes happens that the entrails of one victim may foretel something that is unforThe History of Oracles.

unfortunate and terrible, and those which are immediately after facrifie'd foretel most happy events. What then becomes of the menaces of these first entrails? What! are the Gods so soon Appeas'd? But you'll reply, that in a Bull, which Cæsar was sacrificing, there was no heart found; and since this Animal cou'd not live without a Heart, it must of necessity be, that the Heart vanish'd just in the moment of the Sacrifice. Is it possible that you shou'd have sense enough to know that this Bull cou'd not live without an Heart, and yet have not enough to perceive that this heart cou'd not vanish in a moment, I know not whither. And a:little after he adds; Believe me, you ruine all Physicks by defending the Art of Sooth-Sayers: for them it is not the ordinary course of Nature that gives Birth and Death to all things: and there are some Bodies which come from nothing and shall return to nothing. What Naturalist ever held this opinion?

I cite this passage of Cicero's, but as an example of the extream liberty with which he infulted over that Religion which he himself profess'd. In a thousand other places he shows no more favour to Sacred Fowls, the flights of Birds, and all the Miracles with which the Annals of the chief Priest were fill'd. Why did they not Indict him for his Impiety? Why did not all the People regard him with horror? Why did not all the College of Priests rise up against him? But we have reason to believe that among the Pagans, Religion was a practice, the speculation of which was very indifferent. They did as others did, but believ'd what they themselves pleas'd. This principle is very extravagant; but the People who knew nothing of the impertinency of it, were content with it; and the Philosophers submitted to it very willingly, because it gave them freedom enough.

So that we may see that all the Pagan Religion was meer Ceremony, in which the mind bore no part. The Gods are angry, their Thunder is ready to be discharg'd, how shall they be appeas'd? Must we repent us of the crimes we have committed? Must we re-enter into the paths of that natural Justice which ought to be among all Men? Not at all; we need only take a Calf of such a colour, calv'd at such a time, and cut the Throat of it with such a knife, and this will disarm the wrath of all the Gods: Nay sarther, it is permitted you to laugh at the Sacrifice, if you have a mind to it; 'twill go never the worse with you.

Probably 'twas so also with the Oracles: every one believ'd, that wou'd; however they ceas'd not to consult 'em. So great a force custom has over the minds of Men, that there is no need of Reason to join with it.

F CHAP.

Ap-

CHAP. VIII.

That other Men besides Philosophers have had little esteem for Oracles.

* Herothe first.

Istories are full of Oracles, which were either despis'd by those who receiv'd 'em, or alter'd according to their fancy. * Pattias a Lydian, and subject dot. Book of the Pensians, being fled to Cuma a Greek Town, the Persians sent to have him deliver'd up; the Cumeans presently confult the Oracles of the Branchides, to know what they ought to do with him: the Orack answered, that they shou'd deliver up Pactias. Aristodicus one of the Principal Cumeans, who was not of this mind, obtained through his credit, that they should fend a second time to the Oracle, and caus'd himself to be made one of the Deputie; but the Oracle made the same answer it had done before. Aristodicus unfatisfied

The History of Oracles.

fatisfied with this, as he was walking about the Temple endeavoured to fright away certain little Birds which were building their Nefts there; whereupon he presently heard a voice from the Sanctuary, crying, Detestable Mortal, how dare you fright from this place, those who are under my protection? And yet, great God, (replyed Aristodicus) you Order us to expel Pactias, who is under ours? Tes (answered the God) I do order it, to the end that you who are an Impious People, may be the sooner destroyed, and that you may come no more hither to Importune me with your Questions. It seems by this that the God was press'd home, fince he had recourse to railing; but it appears alfo that Aristodicus did not overmuch believe that it was a God who gave these Oracles, because he went about to entrap him by the comparison of the Birds, and after he had in effect trap'd him, 'tis likely that he believ'd him less a God than he did before. The Cumeans themselves were not much perswaded of his being a Deity,

Deity, since they believed a second deputation might obtain a contrary answer, or that at least the God might consider of what he had to fav. By the way I observe that Arifodicus, when he laid his fnare for the God could not but foresee that they would not let him fright away the Birds from fo Holy a Sanctuary without faying any thing to him; and that the Priests were extreamly jealous of the honour of their Temples.

*Herodot. L.b. 5.

The People of Egina * had ravag'd the Coast of Attica and the Athenians prepar'd themselves for an Expedition against them; at what time there came an Oracle from Delphos, threatning 'em with utter ruine in case they made War with those of Ægina, within the compass of thirty years; but when those thirty years were past, they were only to build a Temple to Æacus and to undertake the War, and then all things wou'd fucceed well. The Athenians, who burnt with a defire of Revenge, split the Oracle in half, and took notice of that part of it only, which related to the Temple of Æacus, which they built out of Hand; but as to the thirty Years, they flighted that, and applyed themselves immediately to attack the Ægineans, and obtained all the Advantages imaginable. was not a particular Person, who had fo little Regard for the Authority of Oracles, but a whole Common-wealth, and that a very superstitious one too.

The History of Oracles.

It is not very easie, to tell what kind of regard the Pagans had for their Religion: For we said a little while ago that they contented themselves with the outwardRespect, which their Philosophers paid to the Oracles; but this was not always fo; for I am not certain, that Socrates refused to offer Incense to the Gods, or behaved himself like other People at the Publick Festivals; but this I am fure of, that the Rabble accused him of Atheism, though they could only guess at his Opinion in this Point; tor he never openly explained him-The People knew well enough self. what part

what was taught publickly in the Schools of Philosophers; how then could they fuffer Opinions, contrary to the Established Worship (and often-times even against the Existence of the Gods) to be there maintain. ed? At least, they knew perfectly well, what was play'd upon Theaters; for those shows were made for them: and it is fore the Gods were never treated with less Respect, than in the Comedies of A. ristophanes. Mercury in his Plutus complains that fight was restored to the God of Riches, who had till that time been blind, and the Plutus now beginning equally to favour all the World, the other Gods (to whom People no longer made Sacrifices to obtain Wealth) were starved for Hunger: And Mercury carries the Humor on so far, as to look out for fome mean Imployment in a Citizen's House, that he might have Meat and Drink. The Birds of Aristophanes are also very bold. All the Comedy turns upon this, That a certain City of Birds, which was designed designed to be built in the Air, would interrupt the Trade and Correspondence that was carried on between the Gods and Men; and by rendering the Birds Masters of all, would reduce the Gods to the utmost Mifery: I leave you to judge, if this be not mighty devout. Yet this was the same Aristophanes, who endeavoured to excite the Rabble against the pretended Impiety of Socrates: There is therefore fomething, which I know not how to express, that is often found in the Affairs of this World. And it is apparent by these Examples, and may be made so by an Infinity of others, if there were Occasion, that the People were sometimes in a Humor to hear with delight their Religion rallied upon, and turned into a Jest; and if they obferved Ceremonies, it was only to free themselves from those Inconveniences which attend an open neglect of them; but'tis evident, that at the bottom, they had not overmuch Faith in them: And they had just the same Respect for Oracles: For most most commonly, they consulted them, that they might have no more Occasion to consult them; and if the Answers were not accommodated to their Designs, they did not much trouble themselves to obey them; for perhaps, it was no constant Opinion even amongst the common People, that Oracles were delivered by a Divine Power.

The History of Oracles.

After all this, it would be unnecessary to mention the Histories of those great Captains, who thought it no Crime, to reckon themselves above, both Oracles and Auguries. And what is most remarkable, is, that this dis-esteem of Religion was practised even in the first Ages of the Roman Common-wealth: In those times of happy Ignorance, when Men were so scrupulously fond of their Religion, and when (as Titus Livius fays in a Place, which I am going to cite) Philosophy, which taught Men to despise the Gods, was not yet Liv. lib. known.

* Papirius made War with the Samnites, and in a certain conjuncture

Aure of time, when the Roman Army with an extreme ardor, defired to come to a Battel, the facred Chickens (forfooth) must be confulted; but the earnestness to fight was so general, that though the Chickens eat nothing at all, when they put them out of the Coop, yet those, who were appointed to obferve the Augury, reported to the Conful, that they had eaten very. well: Upon this, the Conful promifed to his Souldiers both a Battel and Victory. But however secret this Augury was kept, the deceit broke out at last, and there arose a great Contest amongst the Keepers of the Chickens, about the false report that was made: The noise of which came to the ears of Papirius, who faid, that for his Part, he had received a very favourable Augury, and that he was fatisfied with it, and if what was told him were untrue, let those, whose Business it was to take the Augury, look to it; for all the evil would fall upon their Heads. Immediately therefore he ordered, that those unhappy happy People, the Keepers of the Sacred Chickens should be placed in the first Ranks, and so before the signal of the Battel was given, an Arrow (from whence shot none knew) pierced that poor unlucky Keeper who had given a false account of the Augury; as soon as the Consul heard this News, he cried out aloud— The Gods are here present: The Criminal is punifo'd: They have discharged all their Anger on him, who deferved it, and we have now all the Rea-Son in the World to hope the best. Then immediately, he caused the Signal to be given, and gained an intire Victory over the Samnites.

It is very apparent, that the Gods had a less share in the Death of this Poor Keeper than Papirius; and that the General had a Design, by his Death, to encourage those Souldiers, whom the faliness of the Augury might have terrifi'd; for the Romans were acquainted with these Arts and Tricks in the times of their greatest Simplicity.

It must be confessed then, that we should be much in the Wrong, if we should believe these Auguries and Oracles, which the Pagans themselves did not believe. And if we will not think as meanly of them, as some Philosophers, and some Generals of Armies did; yet let us at least have such thoughts of them, as the People themselves sometimes had.

But doubtless (may some object) all the Pagans did not despise Oracles: And some particular Persons, that had no regard for them, are not fufficient intirely to discredit them. And to the Authority of those who did not believe them, we need do no more than oppose the Authority of those that did.

But it may be answered, that these two Authorities are not of equal Strength; for the Testimony of those who uphold a thing that is already established, contributes not much to the support of it; but the Testimony of those who do not believe it, is of Force enough to destroy it; for those who do believe a thing, may perhaps perhaps not know the Reasons, that may be given against the belief of it; but those who do not believe it, cannot chuse but know, why others believe it.

It is quite contrary, when a new thing is to be introduced; for in that case, the Testimony of those that believe it, carries more weight with it, than the Testimony of those who do not believe it; for 'tis probably to be supposed, that those who believe it, must needs have examined it; and those who do not believe it, may perhaps not have considered of it.

I will not fay, that either in the one or the other Case, the Authority of those who believe, or believe not, is a final decision; but I will say, that without a regard be had to the Reasons on which the two Parties sound themselves, sometimes the Authority of one seems more receivable, and sometimes that of the other. Upon the whole Matter, in quitting a common Opinion, or in receiving a new one, we make use of our Reason (whether it be good or bad;) but there there is no need of making use of any to reject a new opinion, or to take up one that is already common; for we have need of strength to resist a torrent, but we need none to follow it.

And it avails not to the credit of Oracles, that among those who believe, that there is something in em of divine and supernatural, there shou'd be found some Philosophers of great name, fuch as the Stoicks are; for when Philosophers are once prepoffess'd with any thing, they are more incurable than the common People, and are as much blinded with prejudices and false Reasons, with which they uphold their opinion. The Stoicks in particular (as proud and fupercilious a Sect as they were) held some opinions which deserv'd pity. How cou'd they chuse but believe Oracles, who believ'd Dreams? The great Chrysippus himself adopted some points for articles of his faith, which had been more suitable for the belief of some filly Old Woman. CHAF.

CHAP. IX.

That the Ancient Christians them selves did not very firmly believe that Oracles were deliver'd by Dæmons.

A Ltho' the Learned Christians in the first Ages, were fond enough of asserting that Oracles were deliver'd by Dæmons, yet they wou'd very often reproach the Heathens with their being imposed upon by their Priests: Which thing was undoubtedly true, fince they afferted it, even with the hazard of losing this system of Dæmons, which they esteemed so favourable to 'em.

Thus Clement Alexandrinus speaks in his third Book of Tapistries.

Boast, if you will, of your Oracles, full of folly and impertinence, of those of Claros, of Apollo Pythius, of Didymus of Amphiaraus, and of Amphilocus. You may yet add your Augurs and

The History of Oracles. . Interpreters of Dreams and Prodigies. Show us in the Presence of Apollo Pythius, those Men who divined by Flower or by Barley, and those who have been so esteemed, because they spoke out of their Bellies. Let the Secrets of the Ægyptian Temples, and of the Hetrurian Necromancers remain still in Darkness, for they are certainly all but extravagant Impostures and Deceits, no better than meer cheating at Dice: And the Goats which are kept for Divination, and the Ravens which are taught to deliver Oracles, are but as the Assistants

Eusebius, in the Beginning of his fourth Book of Evangelical Preparations, proposes at large the best Reasons in the World to prove, that Oracles could be no other, than Impostures: And it is upon those very Reasons, that I pretend to support my self, when I come to treat of the cheats of Oracles in particular.

or Zaneys of Mountebanks, who cozen all Mankind.

Never-

Nevertheless, I must confess, that the Eusebius knew so very well how to prove, that Oracles could not be supernatural, yet he attributes them to Dæmons; and the Authority of a Man so well instructed with the Reasons on both sides, is a very great encouragement to the Party which he embraces.

But it is to be noted, that after E4. febius had very well proved, that 0racles could be no other than the Impostures of Priests, he assures us (without either destroying or weakning those first Proofs) that for all this, they were delivered by Dæmons. But he ought to have cited fome unsuspected Oracle, which had been delivered in fuch Circumstances, that although many others might be imputed to the Artifices of Priests, yet that could not. But Eusebius has done no such thing. This is, as if he should say, I clearly see, that all the 0racles can be no other than Cheats; but yet, I will not believe them to be fo, because it serves my purpose, that the Devil should now and then enter into an Oracle. This

The History of Oracles.

This is a very lamentable kind of reasoning. But I must confess, if Eusebius (in the Circumstances of the times which he lived in) durst not have faid openly, that Oracles were not the Works of Dæmons, it had been excufable; but then in feeming to maintain that they were so, he ought to have managed his Arguments in such a way, that he might have infinuated the contrary with the best Address he was capable of.But we are at liberty to guessat the Reasons, that guided Eusebius in this matter, according to the Esteein we have of him: For my own part, I believe clearly, that he afferted these Oracular Dæmons, rather by way of Apology and from a forced Respect he had for the common Opinion, than on any other Account.

There is a passage of Origen, in his Seventh Book against Celsus, which sufficiently proves that he attributed Oracles to Dæmons, only to accommodate himself to the Times, and to the Disputes, which in that Age were between the Christians and the Pagans.

Pagans. I might (said he) make use of the Authoriy of Aristotles, and the Peripateticks, to render the Pythian Oracle suspected: I could draw from Epicurus and those of his Sect, an Infinity of things, that would discredit Oracles; and I could easily make it appear, that the Greeks themselves made no great Account of them; but conceding that they were not fictions, nor Impostures, let us examine the Case a little more carefully, and consider, whether there were any Necessity, that a God should have any business there, and if it were not more reasonable to believe, that they were managed by evil Damons and Genii, that were Enemies to Mankind.

It is sufficiently evident, that Origen was inclined to believe of Oracles, as we do; but the Pagans, who used them for a Proof of the Divinity of their Religion, had no Reason to consent, that they were but the Artisices of their Priests: So, that to gain a little upon the Pagans, there was a necessity of yielding to them, what they maintained with so much Obstinacy,

Obstinacy, and to let them see, that tho there might be something of Supernatural in the Oracles, yet there was no reason to say, that a true Divinity was concerned in them; and so Dæmons were to be brought upon the Stage.

'Tis true, that it had been much better wholly to have excluded even these Dæmons from Oracles; and by that means, the greatest blow would indeed have been given to the Pagan Religion that can be imagined. But all the World perhaps did not enter so deep into this Matter, and they thought they had done enough, when by the Hypothesis of Dæmons, (which solves the whole Business in two words,) they disparaged all those Miracles, which the Pagans could alledge for their false Worship.

This, it is probable, was the Cause, why in the first Ages of the Church, Men so generally embraced this Opinion concerning Oracles. For we see clearly enough into the Darkness of remote Antiquity, to discover, that Christians did not hold this Opinion

The History of Oracles.

so much for the truth, which they found in it, as for the Advantages, which it gave them in their Disputes against Paganism: And could they be born again in the Age wherein we live, I doubt not, but that being then delivered, like us, from those strange Notions, that obliged them to that Hypothesis, they would have had (almost all of them) the same disofteem of Oracles, as we have at this vime.

Hitherto, we have only taken away the Prejudices that are contrary to our Opinion, and which are drawn, either from the System of the Christian Religion, or else from Phiinsopby, with the general Consent of both Pagans and Christians. We have answered all this, not only by making a fimple Defence, but very often by starting Objections; but low we shall make our Assaults with greater Vigour, and demonstrate by all those particular Circumstances, which we can remark in Oracles, that they never ought to have been attributed to Dæmons.

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

That Oracles were corrupted by Bribery.

T T was so easy a matter to corrupt these Oracles, that it was very evident that they were managed by Men. The Pythian Priestess Philipises, said Demosthenes, when he was complaining that the Oracles of Delphos were alwaies conformable to the interest of Philip.

* When Gleomenes King of Sparta * Herod. was minded to dethrone Demaratus Lib. 6. the former King, on pretence that he was not the Son of Ariston his predecessor, and that Ariston himself had complain'd that his Son was born a little too foon after his Marriage, the Oracle was consulted on so difficult a question; for the thing was of such a Nature, that it cou'd be decided only by the Gods. But Cleomenes himself went beforehand to engage the chief Priestess of Delphos, and so she de-declar'd that Demaratus was not the Son of Ariston. The cheat was sometime after discover'd, and the Priestess depriv'd of her Dignity; for they were bound to revenge this dishonour done to their Oracles, and to endeavour to repair their lost credit.

COII+

Herod. Lib. 5.

*During the time that Hippias was Tyrant of Athens, some Citizens whom he had Banish'd, obtain'd of the Pythian Priestess by the force of Money, that when the Laced amonians flou'd come to consult her (no matter on what affairs ) she should always tell 'em, they must deliver Athens from Tyrany. And the Laced æmonians, to whom the same thing was always repeated, whatever they came about, believ'd at last, that the Gods wou'd never Pardon them, if they contemn'd their so frequent Orders; and thereupon they took up Arms against Hippias, tho he were their Ally.

If the Dæmons delivered Oracles, they were alwaies full of complaifance to those Princes that were once be-

become redoubted; and 'tis to be noted that Hellhad a very great regard for Alexander and Augustus. Some Historians tell us plainly that Alexander had a mind by his absolute Authority to make himself the Son of Jupiter Ammon, both for his interest and the Honour of his Mother, who was suspected to have had a gallant much less considerable than Jupiter: and they add, that before he went to the Temple, he caus'd the God to be advertis'd of his will and pleasure; and the God very honestly obeyed his command. Other Authors hold, that the Priests found out of themselves this way of flattering Alexander. There is none but Plutarch that grounds this Divinity of Alexander on a mistake of the Priest of Ammon, who faluting this King, and intending to fay to him in Greek, Oh my Son, pronounc'd ar arai o for a v, ( for he was a Lybian, sig for and knew not well how to pronounce of must ov. the Greek; ) and the words with this change fignify, Oh Son of Jupiter. And the whole Court fail'd not to construe this mistake of the Priest, to the advantage of Alexander; and without doubt the Priest himself made it pass for an Inspiration of the God who had directed his Tongue, and so by Oracles afterwards consirm'd his ill pronounciation. This last manner of relating this History pleases me extreamly, for I love to find very little Originals give rise to mighty things; this seems to me to be probable, and a Mockery worthy of sporting fortune.

The History of Oracles.

*Pruden.

Augustus was so in Love with Livia, that he took her by force from her Husband, big with Child as she was; and so impatient, was his Passion, that he would not deferr his Marriage till she were delivered, but the action being something extraordinary the Qracle was consulted about it; who knew well how to make its Court to so glorious a Monarch, and was not only content to approve the Marriage, but assur'd him, that Weddings never succeded better, than when the Bride was already with Child. This feems to me a very strange Maxim. There were at Sparta but two families, out of which they might chuse their Kings. But Lysander, one of the greatest Men that ever Sparta bred, fram'd a design to take away this distinction, too advantageous for those two Families, and too injurious to all the rest; and to open a way to Royalty for all those who had merit enough to pretend to it. In order to this, he contriv'd fo perplex'd a plot, that I admire how a Man of Wit could hope to draw any fuccess from it. Plutarch says very well, that it was like a Mathematical Demonstration, to which no Man arrives but by tedious methods. There was a Woman in Pontus who pretended to be Big with Child by Apollo; . Lysander cast his thoughts upon this Son of Apollo, intending to make use of him when he shou'd be born; (this it was to have a very great forefight) and he causes a report to be spread abroad, that the Priests of Delphos had in their possession very ancient Oracles which they were not perreserv'd that privilege for some one that should come of his blood, and who should come to Delphos to justi-fy his descent. The Child of the Woman at Pontus was to be this Son of Apollo; and it was contriv'd that amongst those mysterious Oracles, so closely conceal'd, there should be one found out, which should declare to the Spartans that they ought to give the Crown to Desert only, without having any regard to Families. So that now nothing remain'd but to shape up some Oracles; to get this Son of Apollo ( who was called Silenus )

into the project, to make him

come to Delphos, and to bribe the Priests. All this was done, which feems to me very furprizing; for what strange machines must they found himself embark'd in so dangerous an affair, spoil'd all.

There is scarce a more remarkable example to be found in all History of the corruption of Oracles; but in reporting it, I will not dissemble a truth which my Author faies nothing of; which is, that Lysander had before endeavour'd to corrupt many other Oracles, but could not accomplish it. Dodona refused to take his money, Jupiter Ammon was inflexible, and even the Priests of the place sent deputies to Sparta to accuse Lysander; but by the force of his credit he got himself clear of that affair. The great Priestess of Delphos denyed to sell him her voice. And this makes me believe, that there were in Delphos two Colleges, which held no communication with one another, the one of Priests, the other of Priestelles; for Lysander, who could not corrupt the great Priestess, could yet sufficiently corrupt the Priests. The Pries stesses were those only who deliver'd the Oracles Viva voce, and who with a thousand Antick motions and grimahave made use of, for the accomplishing fo great a design? Silenus comes to Greece and prepares to make himself known at Delphos for the Son of Apollo;but, as ill luck would have it, one of Lysander's creatures having some terrors upon him; at last when he found

ces

ces acted the Posses'd on the Tripos, and seemed to rage, with the inspirations of the God; but in all probability the Priests had a Ware-house of Written Prophecies, of which they were the Masters, the Dispensers, and the Interpreters.

It is not to be doubted, but that the Priests, for the honour of their trade would feem very nice and fcrupulous to those who desir'd to bribe em, especially when things were requir'd wherein there was no reafon to hope for much success; such s was the novelty, which Lysander had a design to introduce into the government of Sparta: and perhaps the faction of Agefilaus, which was against that of Lysander, was somewhat jealous of his project, and had been before-hand with the Oracles. Nor is it to be imagin'd, that the Priests of Ammon would have taken the pains to have come from 'the farthest part of Libya to Sparta, to have accused so great a Man as Lysander, if there had not been a very good understanding between their Oracles and his Enemies, who encouraged them to accuse him.

The History of Oracles.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Erection of new Oracles.

He Oracles, which were some-times erected anew, do as much weaken the Hypothesis of Dæmons, as the Oracles that were corrupted by Bribery.

After the Death of Ephæstion, Alexander, to comfort himself, would needs have it believed, that Ephæstion was a God; To which, all his Courtiers consented without any Difficulty: And immediately, Temples were erected in many Cities to Ephæstion, Festivals were instituted to his Honour, Sacrifices were made to him, Miraculous Cures were attributed to him, and in fine (that nothing at all might be wanting) they made him deliver Oracles. fays,

The History of Oracles.

fays, that Alexander, who was at first astonished to see the Divinity of Ephæstion have such Success, believed it himself at length to be true, and found a great deal of Pleasure, in thinking not only, that he himself was a God, but that he had also the Power of making Gode.

- Adrian committed the same Folly for the lovely Antinous: In Honour of whose Memory he built the City. of Antinopolis, he confecrated Temples and Prophets to him ( lays St. Jerome:) Now there were no Prophets, but in those Temples where there were Oracles. And there is yet remaining this Greek Inscription:

To Antinous,

The Companion of the Gods of Agypt. M. Ulpius Apollonius, his Prophet.

After this, we need not wonder, that Augustus also delivered Oracles, as we find it in Prudentius: And certainly Augustus was as fit to be worshipped shipped as Antinous or Ephastion, who according to all likelihood, owed their Divinity only to their Beauty.

Without doubt, these new Oracles caused even those, who were the least capable of thinking, to make Reflections upon them. Was there not Reason to believe, that these were of the same Nature with the Ancient ones? And to make a due Judgment on the first beginnings of those of Amphiaraus, Trophonius, Orpheus, and of Apollo himself, they needed no more, than to confider those of Ephæstion, Antinous and Augustus.

Tis plain however, that they were not in like Credit with those of more ancient Dates, and that there is a vast difference between them; for they stinted the Gods of the new Edition to certain Answers, that were necesfary for the flattering of Princes; but for any thing else, they were not feriously consulted.

For when Questions of Importance were to be asked, they went to Delphos. The ancient Tripodes had been in Possession of Futurity, time out of Mind:

Mind; and the word of a good fage, experienced God was far more authentick than that of these Upstarts, who were less versed in the Trade. The Roman Emperors, whose Interest it was to advance and set a value on the Divinity of their Predecessors (since themselves claimed the fame) would have endeavoured to have render'd the Oracles of the deified Emperors (fuch as Augustus was) more celebrated, if it had not been that the People, accustomed to their ancient Oracles, could not have the same Confidence in these; for I would willingly believe, that, what Inclination soever they had to the most ridiculous superstitions, yet they laugh'd at these new Oracles, and in general, at all the Confecrations of new Gods: For how could they posfibly take the Eagle, which flew out of the flaming Funeral Pile of a Reman Emperor, to be the Soul of that Emperor, that was taking its Flight to Heaven ?

How then came it to pass, that People were deceived at the first Erection The History of Oracles.

rection of Gods and Oracles? Thus it was, as I conjecture. As for the Gods, Paganism had only two principal forts of them, either Gods who were supposed to be essentially of a Divine Nature, or Gods which did not become so, till after they had been of a humane Nature first. The former fort were declared Gods by the Learned, or by the Legislators with a multitude of Mysteries; and the People neither faw them, nor ever had feen them: The fecond fort (tho? the whole World knew that they had been Men, yetthey) were made Gods by the Inclination of the People, in Memory of their Vertues. They framed to themselves a very elevated Idea of the one fort, because they were above their view; and of the other, because they loved But they could not have that them. Devotion for a Roman Emperor, who was only made a God by the Favour and Order of the Court, and not by the Love of the People, and who besides this, was known so very lately to have been a Man.

H

As for the Oracles, their first Establishment is not difficult to unfold: For find me but half a dozen Persons, whom I can perswade that it is not the Sun that makes the Day, and I will not despair of prevailing with a whole Nation to embrace the same Opinion: For however ridiculous any thing seems at first, if you can but maintain it for some time, so that it gains the Authority of Antiquity, it is then sufficiently proved.

There was on the top of Parnassus a hole, out of which an Exhalation came, which was of fuch a Nature, that it made Goats dance and caper, by furning into their Heads; and perhaps some Body, whose Head was filled with this Exhalation became an Enthusiast, fell a talking, without knowing what he faid, and by chance spoke truth. Immediately, there was fomething Divine fanfied to be in this Exhalation, and that it contained the Knowledge of Futurity; then, they begin to approach this hole with Veneration, and Ceremonies are by little and litThe History of Oracles.

introduced. Thus in tle probability, the Oracle of Delphos was at first erected. And as it owed its Original to an Exhalation, which infected the Head, there was a necessity that the Pythian Priestes's should be in a Fury, when she was to prophesie; but in the greatest part of the other Oracles, Fury was not practised. Let but one Oracle be fet up, and you need not doubt but a thousand will follow the Example; for if the Gods can speak in one, why should they not do so as well in others? The People struck with the Wonder of the thing, and finding of what use it would be, and covetous of the Profit, which they expected from it, defired nothing more than to see Oracles set up in every place; and in time, all these Oracles got the Advantage of Antiquity, which stood them in great stead. And it could not be expected, that the new ones should have such Success, fince they were established by Princes: whereas the People are most willing to believe, what they make themselves. H 2 Add

Add to all this, that at the time of the first institution both of Gods and Oracles, Ignorance was much greater than it was afterwards. Phi-Tosophy was not then known in the World, and the most extravagant superstitions had met with no contradiction from thence. 'Tis true that those we call the People are never mighty knowing; yet the dulness, with which they are alwaies posses'd,receives some difference according to the Ages in which they live. But there are some Ages wherein all the World are the People, and those times without comparison are the most favourable for the introduction of errors. 'Tis no wonder then, that the People had a less esteem for the new Oracles, than for the Ancient ones; but this makes not the old Qracles any whit better than the new ones. Now either a Dæmon went to lodge in the Statue of Ephæstion, to deliver Oracles from thence (as foon as it pleas'd Alexander to erect one to him as to a God:) or if the Statue deliver'd Oracles without this Dæ-

mon, then that of Apollo Pythius might do so as well. And it seems to me very strange and surprizing, that the fancy of Alexander should be able to send a Dæmon to take possession of a Statue, which by that means only was to become an eternal occasion of error to all Men.

C H A P. XII.

Of the places where Oracles were.

E shall now enter upon the History of those Artifices and cheats what the Priests practis'd: which contains many things of Antiquity very agreeable and particular.

Countries that were Mountainous (and by consequence full of holes, and caverns) were alwaies fullest of Oracles; such was Bæotia, which anciently, as Plutarch saies, had a number of them. Where by the way H 2 you had the repute of being the foolishest Nation of the World; and therefore it was a sit country for Oracles, being sull of blockheads and Carverns.

I cannot believe that the first establishment of Oracles was a design'd cheat; but that the People fell into some superstition which gave 'em a Leginning, and that afterwards Men of Wir made their advantages of em. For the weakness of the People is oftentimes greater than could have been foreseen; and many times those that deceive 'em, think of nothing less, until they themselves give some opportunity for the fraud. And my opinion is, that Oracles were not therefore placed in Baotia, because tis Mountainous; but because the 0racle of Delphos had by chance its beginning there, after the manner which we have related, therefore others, that were made in imitation of that in the same country, were situated also in the Caverns: the conveniences of which for that purpose, were

were very well known to the Priests. This custom afterwards spread it self every where; for the pretence of Divine exhalations render'd these caverns necessary: and besides caverns of themselves affect one with, a certain horror, which does not a little advance superstition; and in things that are only to make impreffions on the imaginations of Men nothing is to be neglected. It may be also, that the situation of Delphos contributed to the making it be esteem'd as a holy Town; it was built on a small level which was half way up the Mountain of Parnassus, and encompass'd with precipices which fortify'd it without the help of art. That part of the Mountain which was above it, had the resemblance of a Theatre; and the voice of Men, and the found of Trumpets was multiply'd by the echoes of the Rocks.Do not you believe then, that they knew great use to 'em?

The advantages of the Priests, and the majesty of the Oracles, do equal-how to make even these Echoes of

H4

ly require these caverns; for which reason there was no great number of these prophetick Temples situated on Plains; but yet there were some, whose desects the Priests knew well enough how o remedy, and instead of natural caverns, to accomodate 'em with Artificial ones, that is to fay, what they call Sanctuaries, which were a fort of Caves where the Divinity perpetually resided, and where none but the Priests ever enter'd.

* Plutar. Dial. that Oracles are not ceas'd.

* When the Pythian Priestess placed her self upon the Tripos, it was in her Sanctuary, an obscure place at some distance from a certain little chamber, wherein those who came to consult the Oracles were to stand. The entrance of this Sanctuary was all cover'd over with boughs of Laurel, by whch means those who had the liberty of approaching it, could make no discoveries.

From whence do you think, proceeds the diversity that is to be found in the description which the Ancients give of their oracles? It is be-

caule

The History of Oracles.

cause they never saw what pass'd in the most sacred recesses of their Temples.

For example, they agree not among themselves about the Oracle of Dodona, and yet what could be better known to the Greeks? Aristotle, (as Suidas reports) writes, that at Dodona there were two columns, upon one of which there was a Bason of Brass, and upon the other a Statue of a Child who held a Whip, the cords of which being also of Brass made a noise against the Bason, when they were agitated by the Wind.

Demon (according to the same Suidas) says that the Oracle of Jupiter at Dodona is all encompass'd with Basons, of which, when any one is push'd against the next, the motion is communicated all round to the rest, and they make a din, which continues for fome time.

Others fay, that there was a resounding Oak, which shook its Branches, and leaves together, all the while the Oracle was confulted; and its meaning

ningwas pronounced by the Priestel. ses called Dodonides. It is plain from all this that there was nothing certain but the noise, which was to be heard from without; but not seeing the inward Sanctuary, where the Oracle refided, they only knew, but by conjecture, and the fallacious reports of the Priests what caus'd this noise. Yet we find in History, that some few had the privilege to enter into these Sanctuaries; but they were persons of no less quality than Alexander and Vespasian. Strabo reports from Callisthenes that Alexander enter'd a-Ione with the Priest into the Sanctuary of Ammon, and that all the rest heard the Oracle only from without.

Tacitus also relates that Vespasian when he was at Alexandria, (having already a design upon the Empire) would needs consult the Oracle of Serapis; but before he enter'd, he made every body quit the Temple; and yet for all this, perhaps he did not enter into the Sanstuary. But the instances of this privilege are very very rare; for my Author averrs that he never knew of any other than these two; unless you will add what Tacitus says of Titus, to whom the Priest of Paphian Venus discovered in secret many great things, concerning the designs which he had then in hand. But yet this example proves less than that of Vespasian, that the Priests allow'd great Men the liberty of entring into the Sanctuary of their Temples. Doubtless one ought to have a great deal of credit with the Priests, to oblige em to discover the Arcana of their mysteries; but they did it only to Princes, whose Interest they knew it was to keep the secret; and who, in the circumstances which they were then in, had fome particular reason to raise and not lesfen the reputation of Oracles.

In these dark Sanctuaries it was, that all the machines of the Priests lay; and they enter'd into them by intricate paths under ground. Rustinus describes to us the Temple of Serapis sull of covert ways: and (to bring a testimony yet stronger than his)

100

his) do not the Holy Scriptures difcover to us the impostures of the Priests of Belus, who had a private conveyance to enter fecretly into his Temple, and to take away the meat which was there offer'd to him? It feems to me that this History alone ought to decide the whole question in our favour; for we there have an account of one of the miracles of Pagainsm, which was the most universally believ'd, how that the Gods took the pains to come and Eat the confecrated meat, themselves. Do the Scriptures attribute this prodigy to Damons? not at all; but to the Priests, who were impostors. And it is in this place alone that the Scriptures vouchsafe to give the description of a Pagan miracle; and by not advertifing us that the rest were not of the same nature, they give us plainly to understand that they were. After all, how much easier was it to perswade People that the Gods descended into Statues to speak to 'em, and give 'em wholesome instructions, than that they came down to Eat the members of Goats and Sheep; and therefore furely if it was the Priests that Eat and not the Gods, by much stronger reason, it was they that pronounced the Oracles in their stead.

The History of Oracles.

The Cavities of the Sanctuary, increas'd the voice, and caus'd rebounding Echoes, which imprinted a fort of awful terror in all that approach'd it: you see also in all the Poets that the Pythian Priestesses strain'd their voices, so much beyond the pitch of nature, that they appear'd to be more than humane. Perhaps too that fort *Sir Sam. of * Trumpet which multiplies the Morelands found, was not then altogether un-Trumper. known: and it may be Sir, Samuel Moreland, has but revived this secret, which the Pagan Priests knew before him; tho' they chose rather to get profit by concealing it, than honour by publishing it. And Father Kirker assures us that Alexander had one of these instruments, with which he made himself be heard by his whole Army at the fame time. There is one little thing which I will not forget, because it serves to demonstrate

strate the extream application which the Priests had to cheating. From the Sanctuary or bottom of the Temple there came out sometimes a very agreeable vapour which fill'd all the place where the Consulters were: It was the arrival of the God, you must know, that perfum'd all. Judge then, if Men who carried on their impossive so curiously as to descend to these trisles, would neglect any thing that was essential.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Distinctions of days, and other Mysteries of Oracles.

HE Priests neglected not any kind of precaution; and therefore they had certain days on which no man was permitted to consult the Oracle. This had a mysterious Air, which is still much practis'd in like matters; but yet the chief advantage which they drew from from it, was, that they could put you off with this pretext till another time, either if they had no mind to give you any answer at all, or if they thought fit to have this time of silence for the taking their measures and making their preparatives.

On occasion of these pretended unlucky days, there was deliver'd to Alexander one of the pleasantest O-racles that ever was. He went to Delphos to consult the God, and the Priestess, pretending that it was not then a lawful time to interrogate, would not enter into the Temple. Alexander, who was very rough and impatient, took the Priestess by the Arm and led her in by force; where-upon she cry'd out, Ah, my Son, you are not to be resisted. I desire no more, (says Alexander) this Oracle is e-nough for me.

But the Priests had got another fecret to gain time when they pleafed. Before they would confult the Oracles they must Sacrifice; and if the entrails of the victim were not lucky, then the God was not in an humour to answer; now none judged of the victims but the Priests: and for the most part (as it appears by many examples) they were alone when they examin'd 'em: And often, to delay the time, they would make men begin their Sacrifice a new, and bring a second victim, tho' they had already offer'd one that had the finest Heart and Liver in the World.

mour

What werecall'd the Mysteries and secret Ceremonies of the Gods, were without doubt the best Artifices the Priests could invent to keep People in the dark: and yet they could not so well hide the juggle, but that the cheat would be suspected by many persons; and therefore they contrived among themselves to establish certain Mysteries, which should ingage those that were initiated into them to an inviolable secrecy.

Tis true there were mysteries in those Temples where there were no Oracles but there were no Oracles but what had mysteries: as for instance in that of Delphos. Plutarch, in his Dialogues so often cited, says, that there was no Person in Town of Delphos, nor in all that Country, that was not initiated into their mysteries, and so every body had his dependance on the Priests; and if any one had dared to have opened his mouth against 'em, they presently cryed out, O the Atheist! O the impious Man! and he would have drawn upon himself by his plain dealing such inconveniences, as he could never have got quit of. But yet if there had been no fuch mysteries, the inhabitants of Delphoswould have been alwaies obliged to have conceal'd the knavery of their Priests: for Delphos was a City which had no other Revenue but that of its Temple, and was maintain'd only by its Oracle; but for all that, the Priess were not contented till they had fecured the People to themselves by a double tie, and so they annexed superstition to their interest. And without doubt a Man who had spoken ill of their Oracles, would have been wonderous well received in fuch a Town.

that

Those,

]

Those, who were initiated into their mysteries, gave also surther security for their discretion; for they were oblig'd to make a confession to their Priests of all the most private actions of their Lives: so that by this means they became slaves to their Priests, that their own secrets might be kept.

It was upon this fort of confession that a Laccdæmonian, who was going to initiate himself into the mysteries of Samothrace, spoke roundly thus to the Priest: If I have committed any crimes, surely the Gods are not ignorant of 'em.

Another answer'd almost after the same manner: Is it to you or to God we ought to confess our Crimes? It is to God, says the Priest. Well then, retire thou, answered the Lacedæmonian, and I'll confess 'em to God. These Lacedæmonians were not very sull of the Spirit of Devotion, and I do not doubt but there might have been some Man Wicked enough to go and make a salse confession, to get himself initiated into their myste-

The History of Oracles.

ries, and then afterwards to make a discovery of all their Extravagancies, and publish the Cheats of the Priests.

ries,

I believe that this Misfortune may have happened, for though Priests used all possible means to prevent such Discoveries: They observed narrowly what Persons they were, with whom they had to do; and, I'll warrant you, the two Lacedæmonians, whom we have mentioned, were not admitted. Besides, they declared the Epicureans, incapable of being initiated into their Mysteries, because they were a fort of Men, who made it their Buliness to laugh at them; and I believe, they never delivered Oracles to them: Nor was it very difficult to know them; for all those among the Greeks, who applied themselves to Literature, made choice of some Sect of Philosophy, or other, and took their Appellation from that Sect, almost as we do from a Country. For Example, there were three Demetriuses, which were thus distinguished; one was Demetrius the Cynick, the other, Demetrius the Stoick, and the third, Demetrius the Peripatetick. This Custom of excluding the Epicureans from all Mysteries, was so general, and somecessary for the securing of Sacred things, that it was made use of by that Grand Cheat, whose Life Lucian describes so agreeably; I mean that Alexander, who fooled the Greeks 10 long a time with his Serpents: But he also added the Christians to the Epicureans; for he thought one no better than the other: And before he began his Ceremonies, he always cried, Let the Christians be put out. To whom the People answered in a kind of Chorus, Let the Epicureans be put out also. Nay, he did far worse than all this; for feeing himself tormented by these two sorts of People, (who, tho pulled by different Interests, yet conspired together to turn his Ceremonies into Ridicule) he declared that Pontus (where he then lived) was filled with wicked People, and that the God, whose Prophet he was, would speak no more, if they did not rid themselves of them; and upon this, they murdered all the Epicureans and the Christians.

Daphnean Apollo, in the Suburbs of Antioch, was in the same uneasiness; when in the time of Julian the Apostate, he answered all those, who asked him the Cause of his silence, that they must lay the blame on certain dead People, who were interred in the Neighbour-hood. These dead. People were Christian Martyrs, and amongst the rest, St. Babilas. Now the current Opinion is, that it was the Presence of these blessed dead Bodies, which deprived the Dæmons of the Power of speaking in the Oracle; but 'tis more probable, that the great Concourse of Christians, which daily visited the Sepulchers of these Martyrs, incommoded the Priests of Apollo, who did not care, that such clear-sighted Enemies should be Witnesses of their Actions; and therefore they endeavoured by this false Oracle, to obtain of the Pagan Emperor, that he would cause these Bodies dies, of which the God complained, to be cast out from thence.

118

But let us return to the Artifices of the Priests, of which the Oracles are full: And to comprehend in one Reflection alone, all those that can be made upon them, I would fain have fome one tell me, why the Dæmons could not predict what was to come, unless they were in holes, in Caverns and in obscure Places? And why they did never animate a Statue, in some common Road, where four high Ways met, exposed on all fides to the view of the World? But it may perhaps be faid, that those Oracles which were given in answer to fealed Letters, and those that were delivered by Dreams, could not have been without Dæmons; but 'twill be very easie for us to show, that they had nothing in them more wonderful and miraculous than the rest.

CHAP. XIV.

The History of Oracles.

Of Oracles that were delivered in Answer to Sealed Letters.

He Priests were not so scrupulous in that Point, as not to unfeal the Letters that were brought them. The Custom was to lay them upon the Altar: After which the Temple was to be shut; but the Priests knew very well how to enter, without being perceived. Or else, they put the Letters into the Hands of the Priests, that they might sleep upon them, and receive in a Dream the Answer, which they were to return: And in both Cases, they had the Leisure to open them privately. For the doing this, they had many secret Arts: Some of which we see practised by the salse Prophet of Lucian. And they are to be seen in Lucian himself by any one, that has the Curiofity to know how how the Letters of the Ancients were to be opened, without its being perceived that they were fo.

Certainly, they made use of some of these Secrets, to open these Letters, that the Governour of Cilicia (of whom Plutarch speaks) had sent to the Oracle of Mopsius, which was at Mallus, a City of that Province. The Governour knew not what to think of the Gods; for he was posfessed by the Epicureans with many doubts, which they had put into his Head: So that, he was refolved, as Plutarch pleasantly observes, to send a spy among the Deities, to learn what he could of them: So he gave him a Letter very carefully fealed, to carry to the Oracle of Mopfus. This Envoy came, and, as the Custom was, laid his Letter upon the Altar, and himself flept in the Temple, where he saw in a Dream, a Man, very well made, who faid to him, Black. He carried back this Answer to the Governor with his Letter sealed just as he sent it, to all Appea-The Answer seemed very rirance. diculoùs diculous to the Epicureans, that were at Court; but himself was struck with Astonishment and Wonder at it; and opening his Letter before them, he showed them what he had written; which was this Question: Shall I sacrifice to you a white or a black Bullock? After this Miracle, he was all his Life very much devoted to the God Mopfus. We will hereafter discover to you the Myster ry of the Dream; but it is sufficient at present to tell you, that there is no doubt, but that the Letters were opened and fealed again with great Dexterity and Address; for what neceffity was there of fending a Letter to the Temple, if a Dæmon was to make the Aniwer? And if it sometimes happened so, that the Priests durst not venture to open the Letters, then they endeavoured by their Cunning, to discover what Men came to the Oracle about; for they were commonly Persons of Note, and who had some Design or Passion in their Heads, that was not unknown to the World. And the Priefts

The History of Oracles.

Priests had so much Conversation with those that came to consult, either at their Sacrifices, or during the delays, that were made by the Oracle, before it would answer, that it was not difficult to draw from their own Mouths (or at least to coniecture) what was the Cause of their Voyage: They made them offer one Sacrifice after another, till they had gotten some Light into their Affairs: They put them also into the Hands of certain little Officers of the Tem. ple, who, (under pretence of showing them the Antiquities, the Statues, the Paintings, and the Offerings,) managed the matter fo well, as to pump many things out of them concerning the Business which they came about. These Antiquaries (like those who live upon this Trade now in Italy) were in all the Temples that were any thing confiderable. They knew by Heart all the Miracles that were done, they fet forth to you the Power and Wonders of their God, and they recounted to you a long Story of every Present that was consecrated to him. And therefore, Lucian fays very pleasantly, that all this fort of Men lived and subsisted on Fables; and that in Greece, they would have been very angry to have been told truth, tho' it had cost them nothing. If those who came to confult the Oracle. would not tell all themselves, yet their Servants could not hold their Peace. You must know, that in an Oracle-Town, there were scarce any Persons but Oracle-Officers: Some were Prophets and Priests; others, Poets (who put into Verse the Oracles, which were delivered in Prose;) others, simple Interpreters; others, little Sacrificers, who killed the Victims, and examined their Intrails; others, fellers of Perfumes and Incense, or of Beasts for the Sacrifices; others, Antiquaries; and in fine, all the rest were but In-keepers, whom thegreat refort of Strangers inriched. Now all these People were for the Interest of the Oracle and the God: And if by the means of the Servants belonging to these Strangers, they discovered any thing worth the knowing, ing, you need not doubt, but they soon advertized the Priests of it.

The false Prophet, Alexander, who had set up his Oracle in Pontus. had Correspondents even in Rome it felf, who fent him an Account of the most secret Affairs of those who went to confult him; by this means he could answer without the trick of opening their Letters. And these Correspondencies were doubtless not unknown to the Priests of Apollo of Claros, if it be true, that it was suffionly to tell them the cient Names of those that consulted them. Tacitus speaks thus of them in his fecond Book of Annals. Germanicus went to consult Apollo of Claros, where a Woman does not deliver the Oracles, as at Delphos; but a Man chosen out of certain Families and who is almost always of Miletus; you need tell him only the Number and Names of them that come to consult him; and then he retires into a Grotto, and having taken some Water from a certain secret Fountain there, he answers you in Verse, to whatever you have in your thoughts, though for the most part, he is a very ignorant Fellow.

The History of Oracles.

Here we may observe, that the Oracle of Delphos was committed to the management of a Woman, becauseshe had nothing else to do there, but to make ridiculous and antick Gestures, and to act the being possessed and inspired; but because that of Clares had more difficulty in it, therefore a Man only was to be intrusted with it. We may further remark, that the Ignorance of the Prophet, (which was indeed the greatest Wonder of the Oracle, (could not be very easily discovered; for the Dæmon of the Oracle, as much a Dæmon as he was, laidit down for an indispensable Rule, that they must bring him the Names of those who consulted him. But we are not come to that yet; it is sufficient to have shown how they could answer, not only to seal'd Letters, but also to simple thoughts. It is true, they could not answer to the thoughts of all the World: For what the  $\overline{P}$  riest of Claros did for Germanicus, he could not do for a private Citizen of Rome.

CHAP. XV.

Of Oracles delivered in Dreams.

He Number of Oracles delivered in Dreams is very great; for this way had more of Wonder in it than any other, and yet was not very difficult in the Practice. The most famous of all these Oracles was that of Trophonius in Baotia. Trophonius was but a simple Hero, but his Oracle was delivered with more Ceremony than those of any God.

Pausanias himself, who had been to consult it, and who had pass'd through all its Ceremonies, has lest us a very ample Description of it: And I believe, that an exact Abridgment of his Relation will not be disagreeable to the Reader.

Before

Before any Body descended into the Den of Trophonius, they were obliged to pass a certain number of days in a kind of little Temple or Chapel call'd the Ghapel of good Fortune, and of the good Genius. During this time they used expiations of all sorts; they abstain'd from hot bathings; they wash'd themfelves very often in the River Hercynas; they facrific'd to Trophonius and all his family, to Apollo, to Jupiter, furnam'd the King, to Saturn, to Juno, to one Ceres Europa who had been Nurse to Trophonius; and they lived only upon the flesh of the Sacrifices. It is also more than probable that the Priests liv'd upon nothing else. The Entrails of all these victims were to be examined, to see if Trophonius thought fit that the confulters should descend into his Den; but if these had yielded all the most happy Omens in the World, yet it would not do; for the decisive entrails were those of a certain Ram, which was to be Sacrific'd last; and if they were favourable, then the consulters were led in the Night to the the River Hercynas, where two young Lads about thirteen or four teen years Old rubbed all their Bodies over with Oil; then they conducted them to the Source of the River, and there they made them drink of two forts of Waters: those of Lethe, which effaced out of their Minds all the prophane thoughts which before posses'd 'em; and those of Mnemosyne, which had the virtue to make them remember whatfoever they should see in the Sacred Den. After all these preparatives, they were show'd the Statue of Trophonius, to which they made their Prayers; and then they were covered with linen vests, which were girt about them with certain Sacred Band-· lets, and so at last they were admitted to the Oracle.

The Oracle stood upon a Mountain and was encompassed with a Wall of white Stones, upon which Obelisks of Brass were erected: within this Cercle was a Cavern of the figure of an Oven, cut out by Art, whose entrance was so strait, that Men

The History of Oracles.

Men did not descend into it by Stairs but by little Ladders, and when they were come to the bottom, they found another little Cavern, whose entrance was yet streighter: Here they laid themselves down upon the Earth and took into each hand certain compositions of Honey which they were obliged to carry, and then they put their feet within the opening of the little Cavern, and immediately they perceived themselves pulled into it with much force and fuddenness.

Then it was that things to come were declared to 'em; but not to all in the same manner; for some heard and did not see, and those that faw were not to hear. After this they came out of the Den, creeping upon the Earth, as they entered in, with their feet foremost. Immediately they were put into the Chair of Mnemosyne, where they were asked what they had feen or heard; thence they were led into the Chapel of the good Genius, being still quite amaz'd and out of their Wits; but retrieving.

trieving their senses by little and little, they began to be able to laugh; for till then the grandeur of the Mysteries, and the Divinity with which they were filled, had prevented it; though for my part I think one may well wonder how they could refrain fo long.

Pausanias tells us that there was one Man who enter'd into the Den of Trophonius and never came out again: This was a certain Spy that Demetrius sent thither, to see if there were any thing in that Holy Place, worth the plundering. The Body of this unhappy Man was afterwards found a far off from thence; for 'tis to be suppos'd that he was cast out of the Sacred Den by some more secret way than he enter'd into it.

It is very easy for us to make reflections upon all this; for what leifure and opportunity could the Priests want during all the Sacrifices which they obliged Men to make, to qualify them for the entrance into this Sacred Den? For certainly Trophonius knew how to choose his Men, and would not receive every Body. How did all these Washings, Expiations, and Night-watchings, and these passages into their strait and obfcure Caverns, fill Mens minds with superstition, dread and fear? How many Machines were at work in those dark places. The History of the Spy of Demetrius assures us, that there was no fecurity in the Den for those who came thither with malicious intentions; and that besides the Sacred passage into it, which was known to all the World, the Den had another fecret one, which was known only to the Priests. When Men were drawn in by their feet, it was doubtless done by Cords, (tho' not perceiv'd: ) for they could not put their hands to feel what it was that drew 'em, because they were embarass'd with those compositions of Honey, which they were oblig'd not to let go. And perhaps those Caverns were full of Perfumes and Odours which stupesied the brain: and the Waters of Lethe and Mnemosyne were, also ('tis probable ) prepar'd for

The History of Oracles.

and

for the same effect. To say nothing of the frightful fights and the noises which they might be terrified withal; and when they came out from thence little better than distracted. they talk'd strangely of what they had feen or heard; so that People taking advantage of their disorder, might collect what they pleas'd, and Change it as they thought fitting, and in fine, interpret it as they listed themselves.

Add to all this, that there were fome of those Oracles which were deliver'd in Dreams, where one must prepare ones self by fasting, as that of* Am-Bratus Li. phiaraus in Attica; and then if your 2. Luc of Dream could not receive a clear interpretation, they made you sleep again in the Temple, (at fresh charges) and never fail'd to fill your Head with fancies fit to make you Dream of Gods and extraordinary things: And for the most part, you were to fleep upon the skins of Victims, which perhaps were rubb'd with a drug which had some odd ef-

The History of Oracles.

But when it was the Priefls who sleeping upon the sealed Letters, had themselves the Prophetick Dreams, you may easily imagine, that those Dreams were not very difficult to unfold. Indeed the care, that the Pagan Priests took to hide their Impostures, feems to have been greater than it needed to have been; for if People were credulous and stupid enough to content themselves with the Dreams of the Priests, and to give credit to them, then there was no necessity, to suffer them to dreamin the Temples: And the Priests might have reserved this Privilege to themselves alone, without any Contradiction. For considering what sort of People they were, whom they had to do withal, it was too much Honour for them, to be cheated with Precaution and Address.

There was in Achaia * an Oracle *Pausanion of Mercury, which was delivered in as. this manner: After many Ceremonies, they whispered the God in the Ear, and asked him what Question they fect on the Brain.

But

132

Apolloni-

V.S.

they pleas'd, and afterwards they Ropt their own ears with their hands, and the first words which they heard after they were come out of the Temple, was taken to be the answer of the God. And to the end that the Priests might the more eafily cause them to hear what they pleas'd, and the imposture not be discover'd, this Oracle was alwaies to be consulted in the night.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Ambiguity of Oracles.

Ne of the greatest secrets of the Oracles, and one of the things which most of all assures us that they were managed by Men, is their Ambiguity, and the Art that was used to contrive such answers as would be fuitable to any event that was likely to happen.

* When Alexander fell fick all of a fudden sudden at Babylon, some of the Principal of his court went to pass a Night in the Temple of Serapis, to inquire of that God, if it were not fit for em to bring their King thither to be cured by him. The God answer'd, that it was better for him to remain where he was. Serapis had reason; for if he had advised the bringing Alexander thither, and he had died by the way, or in the Temple it self, what would they not have faid? But if the King continued at Babylon and recover'd his Health there, what a mighty Glory would it have brought the Oracle? and if he Died, it might be said to be the best that could befall him after the conquests that he had made, which if he lived, he could neither augment nor preserve. And without doubt this last interpretation was made for the honour of Serapis, after Alexander was Dead.

Macrobius saies, that when Trajan had a Design of attacking the Parthians, he was desired to consult the Oracle of the .City Heliopolis about it, whither the manner was only to fend fend a sealed Letter. Now, though Trajan put no great Confidence in Oracles, yet he sent a sealed Letter thither, in which there was nothing written, and they fent him back a fuitable Answer, that is, none at all. So that Trajan being now convinced of the Divinity of Oracles, fends another sealed Letter, in which he demands of the God, whether he should finish the War, that he had undertaken, and return to Rome, or not? The God ordered, that they should take a Vine, which was one of the Offerings of the Temple, and cut it in pieces, and so carry it to Trajan. The Event, says Macrebius, was conformable to the Oracle; tor Trajan dying in this War, his Bones, which were represented by the broken Vine,

KA

Arian. Lib. 7.

All the World knew for certain that the Emperor designed to make War with the Parthian, and that this was the Business about which he consulted the Oracle: And, the Oracle was so cunning, as to return him an Allegorical Answer, and so general were carried to Rome.

The History of Oracles.

general an one, that it could not fail of being true. For if Trajan had returned to Rome, either Victorious, but hurt, or having lost some part of his Souldiers; or if he were overcome, and his Army put to Flight; or if any division had been amongst his Men; or if any Mutiny had happened amongst the Parthians; or if any had happened at Rome in the Absence of the Emperor; if the Parthians had been wholly conquered; or if they had been but partly worsted, or that they had been abandoned by fome of their Allies, in any one of these cases, this broken Vine miraculoufly had foretold all: And there was no question, but some one of these would happen. And I believe the Bones of the Emperor that were carried to Rome, and by which they explained the Oracle, were, for all that, the only thing of which the Oracle never thought.

This Vine puts me in mind of a kind of Oracle that accommodated it self to every thing, of which, as A-puleius tells us, the Priests of the Goddels

Goddess of Syria were the Inventor.

They made two Verses, the Sence whereof was this:

Two Oxen yok'd together cut the Earth,

And make the Fields produce a fruitful Birth.

Now there was no Question, which they could not answer with these two Verses. For if they were consulted upon a Marriage, it was the same thing, Oxen yoked together, and a fruitful Birth. If they were consulted about the Purchace of any Land, again, it was yoked Oxen, and fruitful Fields. If about a Journey; the Oxen yoked together, and so ready to go forth, and the fruitful Fields promised a great Prosit or Success by the Journey. If one went to War, these Oxen under the Toke, do clearly fignifie, that you shall put your Enemies under the Yoke. Certainly, this Goddess of Syria did not love much tatling, and had found out the true secret to satisfie all Questions

Questions with one single An-

The History of Oracles.

Those, who received these ambiguous Oracles, took the pains very willingly to justifie them, by adjusting the Success and the Prediction together. And often-times, that which had but one Sence (in the Intention of those who delivered the Oracle,) was after the event, found to have two. For the Impostors might be secure, that their Honour would be preserved with all the Care imaginable by those very Persons whom they abused. Thus, when the false Prophet Alexander was asked by Rutilianus, what Masters he should provide for his Son; he answered, that he should let him have Pythagoras, and Homer. Rurilianus took it in the plain sence, that he should study Philosophy and Humanity. But the young Man dying within a few days after, they reprefented to Rutilianus, that the Prophet was very much mistaken: But Rutilianus found out (with a very great deal of Subtilty) that the Death

Death of his Son was foretold by the Oracle, because it appointed a Pythagoras and Homer, two dead Men, for his Tutors.

CHAP. XVII.

The Cheats of the Oracles manifestly discovered.

BUT there is now no need of being any further folicitous to detect the cunning of the Priests, by Subtilties spun almost as finely as their own; for they were fully and clearly discovered to the Eyes of the whole World, when the true Religion triumphed entirely over Paganism, under the Christian Emperors.

Theodoret, says, that Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, shewed the Inhabitants of that Town, the hollow Statues, into which the Priests privately crept to deliver their Oracles. When

When by the Order of Constantine, the Temple of Asculapius, in Cilicia, was pluck'd down, they chased thence, (says Eusebius, in the Life of this Emperor,) not a God, nor a Dæmon, but the Cheat, that had so long deluded the People. He adds, that in general, in the demolished Idols, they found no Gods at all, nor Dæmons, nor so much as a melancholv Shade or obscure Specter; but only some Hay, Straw, or Ordures, or the Bones of dead Men. It is from him, that we learn the History of Theotechnus, who set up in the City of Antioch, the Statue of Jupiter, God of Friendship; which questionless was contrived to deliver Oracles, fince Eusebius fays, that there were Prophets belonging to this God. Theotechnus, upon this Account got so great Credit, that Maximin made him Governour of all the Province. But Licinius coming to Antioch, and suspecting the Imposture, caused the Priests and Prophets of this new Jupiter, to be tortured with the Rack; hereupon they confessed all, and both both they and their Accomplices were put to a cruel Death, their Master Theotechnus suffering first, The same Eusebius, in the fourth Book of his Evangelical Preparations, fays, that in his time, the most fa. mous Prophets amongst the Pagans, and their most celebrated Divines, of whom some were Magistrates of their Cities, were compelled by Torments to discover the very particulars of all the Cheats of the Oracles. If we were now to make out what the old Christians believed of them, all these Passages of Eusebius, in my Opinion, would decide the Question. They admitted Dæmons indeed in a certain general System, which ferved for their Disputes; but when they came to particular matters of rather directly denied them.

I cannot believe, that we need any better Witnesses against the Damons, than the Pagan Priests themselves, by whose Confessions, the thing seems to me to be clearly made out. I will only therefore add one Chapter about

Fact, they fpoke little of them, or

The History of Oracles.

about their Lots; not to discover the Imposture of them, for that is comprehended in what we have already said of Oracles in general; and besides it will be sufficiently apparent of its self; but that I may not omit a species of Oracles very samous in Antiquity.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Lots.

and, as it were, the Oracles of Fortune, by which she decides all things: And they are the Instruments we make use of, to know what this Decision is.

These Lots for the most part were a kind of Dice, whereon were ingraven certain Characters, or words, the Explication of which was to be sought for, in Tables made for that purpose. The manner of using these

Loss

Lots was various: In some Temples they cast them out of their Hands, in others they threw them out of an Urn; from whence comes this Proverb so common with the Greeks, the Lot is cast.

This Game of Chance was always ushered in by Sacrifices, and abundance of Ceremonies. The Priest, as 'tis probable, knew how to manage the Dice; but if they would not take that pains, they might e'en let'em run as they would, fince they were always Masters of the Explanation.

\* The Lacedæmonians went one \*Cicero de Divin. lib. day to consult the Lots of Dodona, upon a War that they were undertaking; for besides the speaking Oaks, the Doves, the Basons, and the Oracles, there were also Lots of Dodona. After the Ceremonies were past, just as they were going to cast the Lots, with a great deal of Respect and Veneration, a Monkey of the King of the Molossi, being got into the Temple, threw down the Lots and the  $\nabla rn$ ; upon this the frighted Priestess told the Lacedæmonians, that they ought not to think of conquering, but only how to fave themfelves. And all the Writers affure us, that the Lacedæmonians never received a more unlucky Presage.

The History of Oracles.

The most famous Lots of all, were those of Præneste and Antium, two little Towns in Italy. At Antium. there were wonderful Statues that moved of themselves, (according to the Testimony of Macrobius, Book 1. Chap. 23.) whose different Motions, either ferved for Answers, or declared whether it was fitting to confult the Lots, or not.

And there is a Passage in Cicero's Second Book of Divination, which tells us, that they confulted the Lots of Præneste, with the Consent of Fortune; which implies that the Statue of Fortune could nod with its Head, or give some other Signs of its will and Pleasure.

We find also, that there were other Statues, which had this very fame Faculty. Diodorus Siculus and Quintus Curtius say, that Jupiter Hammon was carried by four-score

Priests.

that

Priests, in a kind of golden Chair of State, covered with a rich Canopy, from which hung abundance of silver Cups that made a jangling noise, and that he was followed by a great Number of Women and Maids, who sung Hymns in the Language of their Country; And that this God, by some Motions or Signs that he made, instructed the Priests that carried him, which way he would have them go.

The God of Heliopolis in Syria, according to Macrobius, did as much: All the difference was, that he would be carried by Men of the best Quality in the Province, and such as had a long time liv'd in perfect continence, and had their Heads shaved.

Lucian, in his Treatise of the Goddess of Syria, says, that he once saw a much more miraculous sort of Apollo, who, being carried on the shoulders of his Priests, took a sancy to leave them in the lurch below on the Earth, and to take a Walk by himself in the Skies. And that all this should be done in the sight of such The History of Oracles.

a kind of Man as Lucian, is no small Wonder.

But I am so tired with discovering the Cheats of these Pagan Priests, (and am perswaded, my Reader is as weary of it as I am my self) that I will not spend any time in considering how it was, that they made their Puppets dance, and play'd all their juggling tricks.

In the East, the Lots were Arrows, and to this day the Turks and Arabians make use of them in the same manner. The Prophet Ezekiel says, that Nebucadonosor mingled his Arrows against Ammon and Hierusalem, and the predicting Arrow slew towards Hierusalem; which decided the Question, against which People he should make War.

In Greece and Iraly, they often drew the Lot from some samous Poet, as Homer or Euripides: And what first presented it self at the opening of the Book, was looked upon to be the Decree of Heaven. And History surnishes us with a thousand

Examples of this kind.

pridius.

Lam-

The History of Oracles.

'Tis evident, that about two hundred Years after the Death of Virgil. they set a great Value on his Verses, and began to believe them prophetick, and to use them in stead of the ancient Lots of Præneste. * A. lexander Severus, in particular, (at a time, when Heliogabalus was not much his Friend) received this Anfwer in the Temple of Praneste out of Virgil.

----Si qua fata aspera rumpas, Tu Marcellus eris.

If you can vanquish Destiny, The Great Marcellus you shall be.

Here my Author remembers, that Rabelais mentions the Virgilian Lot, which Panurge confulted concerning his Marriage: And he judges that Place of the Book, as learned, as 'tis agreeable and full of fancy; he fays that the Whimsies and Follies of Rabelais are many times more to be esteemed, than the most serious Discourses of others. I would not forget forget this Elogy, because 'tis a thing very fingular to meet with, in the midst of a Treatise of Oracles that is full of knowledge and erudition. 'Tis certain that Rabelais had a great deal of Wit and reading, and a particular Art of writing of Learned things in a frolickand jesting way, and of relating a thousand Ridiculous and fantastical stories without being tiresome to his Reader. And 'tis a misfortune that he liv'd not in an Age that would have oblig'd him to a Style more Gentleman like and inoffensive.

These lots were afterwards in use amongst Christians; who consulted the Holy Scriptures for that purpose, as the Pagans did their Poets. Saint Augustin, in his 119 Epistle to Januarius, appears not wholly to disapprove it, unless it be done for some wicked or vain end. Gregory of Tours tells us himself what his practice was: He pass'd seven days in Fasting and Prayer, afterwards he went to the Tomb of Saint Martin, where he opened fome Book of the Scripture as his fancy led him, and took

for

THE

The History of Oracles.

SECOND DISCOURSE.

That Oracles did not cease at the coming of Jesus Christ.

HE greatest difficulty that regards Oracles is now furmounted, fince we have proved that Dæmons were not at all concerned in them. And if this be true. then Oracles fignify so little to the Christian Religion, that there will be no necessity to maintain, that they ceased precisely at the coming of Jesus Christ.

CHAP,

for the answer of God, the first past fage which offer'd its felf to his view: and if this passage made nothing for his purpose, then he opened the Bible in another place.

Others took the first thing they heard fung when they enter'd into the Church, for a Divine presage.

But who would believe that the *Cedrenus, Emperor * Heraclius, deliberating in what place he should Winter his Army, should determine it by this kind of Lot? He purify'd his Army during three days, and afterwards open d the Book of the Evangelists, and there found that Albany was mark'd out for his Winter quarters. Was that an affair of which a Man could reasonably hope for a decision in the Scriptures?

> At last indeed the Church has quite banished this superstition, but it took up a great deal of time first: For when once our minds are posfess'd with an error, 'tis a wonder if ever we will be undeceiv'd.

The end of the first Discourse.

THE

CHAP. I.

The weakness of those reasons upon which the opinion, that. Oracles ceased at the coming of Jesus Christ, is founded.

Hat which made most Men believe that Oracles ceas'd at the coming of Jesus Christ, was the prediction of Oracles themfelves, which foretold their own silence, and the confession of the Heathens that liv'd about the time of Fesus-Christ, who often speak of their cellation.

We have already shown the falsity of these pretended Oracles, in which a Dæmon that was struck dumb, said himself that he was struck dumb:but these Demons were either seign'd by the over great Zeal of the Christians, or too easily receiv'd by their credulity.

I will recite one of those Oracles upon upon which Eusebius supports his opinion, that they did cease at the Birth of Fesus Christ. 'Tis taken from Porphyrius; and Eusebius never fails of making all the advantage he can of the testimony of this Enemy.

The History of Oracles.

I will declare to you the truth concerning the Oracles of Delphos and Claros, (faid Apollo to his Priests.) In times past there came from the Bosom of the Earth an infinity of Oracles and Fountains, and Exhalations, which inspir'd People with Divine furies; but the Earth by the continual changes which time makes in it, has reimbibed and caus'd to enter into its self, all those Fountains, Exhalations and Oracles: and there remains now no more but the Waters of Mycale in the Didymean fields, and the Oracles of Claros, and Parnassus.

Upon this, Eusebius concludes in general that all Oracles were then come to an end.

But 'tis certain that three of 'em at least are to be excepted, according to this Oracle which he reports him, felf: But he takes notice only of those words that make for his purpose, and troubles not himself with the rest.

155

But besides, does this Oracle of Porphyrius tell us, when the other Oracles ceas'd not at all; tho Eusebius will by all means have it understood to be at the time of the coming of Jesus Christ. We may commend his zeal, but his manner of arguing does not at all deserve our Praise.

Nay suppose that Porphyrius's O. racle did speak of the coming of Jer sus Christ, would it follow therefore that all Oracles then ceas'd, and that none remain'd? Eusebius perhaps imagin'd that this exception fignified little, and that it is sufficient if the greatest part of the Oracles did then cease; but he is mistaken, for if Oracles had been deliver'd by Dæmons, who by the birth of Jesus Christ were condemn'd to eternal silence, then no Dæmon would have been excepted, or privileged. So that if there was but one Damon remaining after the

the History of Oracles.

the Birth of Jesus Christ, it would be sufficient to prove that it was not His Birth that imposed a perpetual silence upon Oracles. This is one of those cases, where the least exception ruins the general proposition.

But you may fay perhaps, that Demons at the Birth of Fesus Christ did cease to deliver Oracles; but that yet Oracles continued still for all that, because the Priests counterseited them.

This supposition is without any soundation; for I can prove that Oracles continued four hundred years after the Death of Christ, and there is no mention any where made of the least difference observed between those that were delivered after the Birth of Jesus, and those that were pronounced before it. And besides, if the Priests could so dextrously put the cheat upon People during the space of sour hundred years, why could they not continue to do it longer?

Of all the Pagan Authors that are in request with those who would make us believe that Oracles ceas'd at the coming of Jesus Christ, Plutarch is the chief: He lived some hundreds of years after Christ, and has written a Dialogue concerning the cessation of Oracles. Many Men upon his Authority only, have taken up their opinions, and espoused their party; and yet Plutarch positively excepts the Oracle of Libadia, (that is to say, of Trophonius) and that of Delphos: where, as he says, Anciently there was imployment enough for two Priests, and sometimes for three, but in his daies one served the turn.

the

Besides, he confesses that the Oracles were fallen to decay in Bæstia, a Country, which had formerly been famous for producing a great number of them.

All this, 'tis true, proves the cessation of some Oracles, and the diminution of the credit of others; but not the intire cessation of all, which however there is an absolute necessity for those to prove, who maintain the common opinion.

The Oracle of Delphos was not so mightily decay'd in Plutarch's time: for he himself tells us in another Treatise, that the Temple of Delphos was then far more magnificent than ever it had been; that they had repaired the Ancient Buildings which time began to ruin, and that they had added others to it, which were altogether after the Modern mode; that there was a small Town near Delphos, which increas'd daily by little and little, and had its nourishment from the old City, like a little Tree that springs from the foot of a great one; and that this little Town was become more confiderable than it had been for a thoufand years past. But even in this Dialogue, which treats of the cessation of Oracles, Demetrius the Cilician, one of the interlocutors, fays, that before he began his Voyage, the Oracles of Amphilochus Mopsus were as flourishing as ever; but that since he came from thence he knew not how things stood with 'em. You see then what is to be found in favour of the cessation of Oracles at the the coming of Christ in this Treatile of Plutarch, to which a Multitude of Learned Men referr you for the Proof of it.

Here my Author pretends, that we are also fallen into a großmistake, concerning a Passage in the second Book of Divinations: Where Cicero laughs at the Oracle, that was delivered by Apollo in Latin to Pyrrhus, who consulted him concerning the War, he was going to make against the Romans. This Oracle had a double meaning, so that it could not be understood, whether Pyrrhus should overcome the Romans, or the Romans overcome Pyrrhus. The Equivocation is so peculiar to the Latin Phrase, that one cannot well render it into English; for my part, I cannot translate it better than thus:

I do pronounce that Rome Pyrrhus shall overcome.

But the Words of Cicero, concerning this Oracle, are these that follow. The History of Oracles.

In the first Place. (Says he

In the first Place, (fays he,) Apollo never spoke Latin; in the second Place, the Greeks knew nothing of this Oracle; thirdly, Apollo in the time of Pyrrhus had left off Rhiming; in fine, although the Aacides (from which Family Pyrrhus was descended,) were far from being Men of a fine Judgment, or of a Piercing Wit, yet the Equivocation of the Oracle was so manifest, that Pyrrhus could not chuse but perceive it. But why is it so long since any Oracles were delivered in this kind at Delphos? For this Reason it is, that now adays nothing is more despised than they are.

It is on these last words, that the Opinion is grounded, that Oracles were not delivered at Delphos in the time of Cicero.

But my Author says, that they are deceived, who think so, and that these Words, Why are there no more Oracles delivered in this kind at Delphos? Plainly shew, that Cicero speaks only of Oracles in Verse: Since he is discoursing in that Place about one wrapp'd up in an Hexameter.

But Iknow not whether we ought to be altogether of my Author's Opinion; for observe how Cicero goes on. When the Defenders of Oracles are hard put to it; they answer, that this Virtue in the Exhalation of the Earth, which inspired the Pythian Priestess, is evaporated with length of time. One would think that they were talking of some Wine that was grown flat, and that had lost its Spirits; for what time can consume. or dry up a Vertue all Divine? And what can be more Divine than an Exhalation from the Earth, which works such an Effect upon the Soul, as to give it both the Knowledge of Futurity, and the Power to express its self in Verse.

It froms to me, that Cicero means, that the whole Virtue was intirely lost: Whereas he would have acknowledged, that a good part of it had remained, if Oracles were still delivered at Delphos, though but in Prose. For no Man will say, that a Prophecy is nothing at all, unless it be in Verse?

I do not think, that they are so mightily mistaken, who take this Passage for an absolute Proof of the entire Cessation of Oracles at Delphos; but they do ill, who pretend to draw any Argument from thence, for attributing this Cessation to the Birth of Jesus Christ. For the Oracle ceased too soon for that, since it appears by this very Passage, that it ceased a long time before Cicero.

But for all this, the thing was not in Truth, as Cicero seems to understand it in this Place. For he himself, in his First Book of Divinations, makes his Brother Quintus, stands up for Oracles, to speak in this manner. I relie upon this Point, that the Oracle of Delphoshad never been so famous, and had never received so many offerings from Kings and all sorts of People, if the Truth of its Predictions had not been acknowledged. Now indeed it is not so famous, because its Predictions are less true: And so, on the other side, if they had not been once extremely true, it would never have been so mighty famous heretofore, heretofore as it was. But (which is yet a stronger Proof) Cicero himself (as Plutarch relates in his Life) did in his Youth consult the Oracle of Delphos, concerning the Conduct he ought to keep in the World: and 'twas answered him, that he should follow his Genius, rather than conform himself to the Opinion of the Vulgar. Now if it were not true, that Cicero consulted the Oracle of Delphos, yet, at least, this Story obliges us to grant, that in the time of Cicero, it was consulted.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

The History of Oracles.

Why the Ancient Authors contras dicted each other, very often, as bout the time of the Cessation of Oracles.

How comes it to pass then, that in the fifth Book of Lucan's Phar-salia, we find this Account of the Oracle of Delphos? The Oracle of Delphos, which has been filent ever since Great Men were afraid of what was to come to pass, and forbid that the Gods should declare it, is the most considerable of all those Favours of Heaven, which our Age has lost.

And a little after, Appius, who was desirous to know the Destiny of Italy, had the Boldness, to go and interrogate this Cavern, that had been mute so long; and to move the Tripos, that had been so long undisturbed. And that Juvenal lays in a certain

[ 2

165

In fine, whence comes it, that among the Authors of the same Age, we find some, who say, the Oracle of Delphos speaks no more, and others that say, he speaks still? And whence comes it, that the same Author sometimes contradicts himself so often upon this Subject?

The Reason most certainly is, because Oracles were neither in their Ancient Reputation, nor yet were they absolutely ruined: So, that one may well say, that in Comparison of what they had formerly been, they were nothing; but yet, for all that, they continued to be something still.

Besides, some Oracles were ruined for a certain time, and afterwards came into Credit again; for Oracles were subject to several Adventures and Missortunes: And we ought not to believe them annihilated from the time of their being mute; for they might afterwards assume a Voice again and speak.

Plutarch

Plutarch says, that in old time a Dragon came; and lodg'd upon Parnassus and caus'd the Delphick Oracle to be deserted, and that it was commonly believ'd, that solitude invited the Dragon to that place; but that 'twas more probable that he caus'd the solitude, Greece being fill'd with Cities, &c.

You see that Plutarch speaks of a time very far distant back. So the Oracle had fince its erection been once abandon'd already, and we are fure that afterwards it was very well re-established. But after this, the Temple of Delphos underwent divers misfortunes. It was plundered by a Thief descended from Phlegias, by the Army of Xerxes, by the Phocens, by Pyrrhus, by Nero; and last of all, by the Christians under Constantine. All this did no great good to the Oracle, for the Priests were either massacred, or dispers'd, the place was abandon'd, the Sacred utenfils were lost, and it must of necessity require great charges, care, and

The History of Oracles.

167

and time, to rigg out these Oracles again fit for holy use.

All this then may be possible, that Cicero in his Youth consulted the Oracle of Delphos, that during the War between Cæsar and Pompey, and in that general disorder of the Universe, the Oracle was mute, as Lacan will have it; and that after the end of this War, when Cicero writhis Pook of Philosophy, it might begin to be re-established so much, as to make Quintus fay it was still in the World; and yet so little, that Cicero might suppose that it was not in being.

When Dorimachus, as Polybius reports, had burnt the Portico of the Temple of Dodona, had quite destroy'd the Sacred Place of the Oracle, and had pillag'd, or ruin'd all the offerings, an Author of that time might very well say that the Oracle of Dodona spoke no more. But for all this, in the following age, another Author might be found transmitting to posterity some of the answers, which it gave in his time.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

The History of the Duration of the Oracle of Delphos, and some other Oracles.

E cannot better prove, that about the time of Jesus Christ, to which the filence of the Delphick Oracle is so usually referred, it did not altogether cease, but was only interrupted, than by fetting down all the different occasions that we find it took of speaking fince.

Suetonius in the Life of Nero fays that he, confulting the Oracle of Delphos, was warn'd to have a care of feventy three years; and that thereupon Nero believ'd, he should not Die till that Age, and never thought of old Galba, who being seventy three years old took his Empire from him. For he was so conceited of his long life and good fortune, that having loft in a Ship-wrack things of a very M 4 great great value, he bragg'd that the fishes would bring 'em back to him again. But certainly Nero either receiv'd from the Oracle of Delphos some ot'rer answer that seem'd less favourable to him, or was discontented that he was destin'd to live no longer than Seventy three years, or elfe he would never have took from the Priests of Delphos the Cirrhaan Fields, to give them to his Soldiers. He also took from the Temple more than five hundred Statues, some of Men, and, some of Gods, but all of Brass; and to prophane or for ever abolish the Oracle, he caus'd several Mens Throats to be cut at the very Mouth of the Sacred Cavern, where the Divine exhalation issued forth.

That the Oracle after such an adventure as this, should be mute till the Reign of Downtian, and, as Juvenal says, should speak no more, is not at all to be wonder'd at.

And yet 'tis impossible it could be altogether mute from the time of Nero to that of Domitian; for observe what Philostratus saics in the Life.

Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, who came to the Court of Domitian: Anpollonius visited all the Oracles of Greece, that of Dodona, that of Delphos, and that of Amphiaraus. And in another place he speaks yet farther: Tou may see Apollo of Delphos made illustrious by the Oracles which he delivers in the midst of Greece; he answers those who consult him, as you know very well your self, in very few words, and without accompanying his answers with prodigies; altho it were very easie for him to make Parnassus tremble, to stop the course of Cephisus, and to change the Waters of Castalia into Wine; but he tells the truth plainly and does not amuse himself to make an unprofitable shew of his power. 'Tis very pleasant that Philostratus should expect to have the greater value set upon this Apollo, because he was no great worker of Miracles. But I think there lurks in this place fome secret Poison against the Chri-Stians.

We formerly acquainted you, that in the time of Plutarch, who lived under

Dion Cassius. Pausanias. der Trajan, this Oracle was yet in being, but reduc'd to one fingle Priestefs, tho' in elder times it had two or three. Under Adrian, Dion Chrysostom says, that he consulted the Oracle of Delphos, and relates one of its answers, which seem'd to him to be very intricate, and which was so indeed.

Under the Antonini, Lucian fays, that a Priest of Tyana, went to demand of the false Prophet Alexander, if the Oracles that were deliver'd then at Didymi, at Claros, and at Delphos, were indeed the answers of Apollo, or impostures. Alexander who had a regard for these Oracles, which were so like his own, answered the Priest, that it was a secret not fit for him to know. But when this wife Priest demanded what he should be after his death, he was answered boldly, Thou shalt be a Camel, then a Horse, then a Philosopher, and at last a Prophet as great as Alexander.

After the Antonini, three Emperors disputed the Empire, Severus Septimus, Pescennius Niger, and Clodi-

us Albinus. Delphos was consulted, says Spartianus, to know which would be best for the Commonwealth: and the Oracle answered in Verse, The Black is the best, the African is good, but the White is the worst of all. By the Black was meant Pescennius Niger; by the African, Severus Septimus, who was of Africa; and by the White, Clodius Albinus. It was ask'd afterwards, Who should remain Master of the Empire; and it was answer'd, The blood of the White and the Black shall be spilt, and the African shall governthe World. Then it was demanded, how long time he should govern; and it was answered, He shall ride on the Sea of Italy with twenty Ships, tho with one Ship he may cross the Sea. By which it is meant that Severus should reign twenty years. Here the Oracle reserv'd to it self an obscure meaning, to have recourse to in time of need. But yet in the times when Delphos was most Flourishing, there were never better or more substantial Oracles than these.

We find nevertheless, that Clemens Alexandrinus, in his Exhortations to the Gentiles, which he composed, either under Severus, or about that time, says very plainly, that the Fountain of Castalia, which belonged to the Oracle of Delphos, and that of Colophon and all the other Prophetick Fountains, had at last, tho it were late first, lost their sabulous Virtues.

Perhaps in that time, these Oracles were sallen into one of those Silences, to which they were so subject by Intervals: Or perhaps, because they were no more in Reputation, Clemens Alexandrinus thought sit to say, they were totally filenced.

Tis certain, that under Constantine, thus, the Father of Constantine, and during the Youth of Constantine, Delphos was not yet ruined; since Eusebius writes in the Life of Constantine, that he said, that there was then a Report, that Apollo had delivered an Oracle, not by the Mouth of a Priestess, but from the bottom of the obscure Cavern, which said--

That the fust Men, who were upon Earth, were the Cause, that he could not speak Truth. A very pleasant Reason this! Besides the Oracle of Delphos must then necessarily be in a very miserable Condition, since it could not maintain one Priestess.

Blow under Constantine, who commanded, or suffered, that Delphos should be pillaged. Then, says Eufebius in the Life of Constantine, they produced in the open view of all the People, in the Publick Flaces of Constantinople, those Statues, which the Errors of Men had caused to be selong Time the object of Veneration and Worship; here Apollo Pythius, there Sminthius. The Tripodes were exposed in the Circus and the Heliconian Muses in the Palace, to the railleries of all the World.

But after all this, the Oracle of Delphos came into credit once again; for the Emperor * Julian sent to enquire of it, about the Expedition, that he was designing against the Persians. If the Oracle of Delphos did • Theodsret. The History of Oracles.

did continue any longer, we cannot however extend its History farther; for there is no more spoken of it in any Author. But in all likelihood, that was the very time, when it became filent, and its last Words were addressed to the Emperor Julian, who was so zealous for Paganism. I cannot therefore well understand, how some Great Men could put Augustus in the Place of Julian, and boldly affirm, that the Oracle of Delphos ended with the Answer it delivered to Augustus, concerning the Hebrew Infant. Some * Modern Authors, P. Peucer. who thought Oracles worthy of a Glorious End, fince they made fo great a Noise in the World, have contrived one very fit, to give them a Reputation. They found in Sozomenus and Theodoretus, that in the time of Fulian, the Temple of Apollo, which was in the Suburbs of Antioch, called Daphne, was fet on Fire, no Body being able to discover the Author, or Cause of it; but the Pagans accused the Christians of this Con-Hagration, and the Christians attributed buted it to Thunder and Lightning thrown by the Hand of God. Theodoretus indeed fays, that the Lightning fell upon this Temple, but Sozomenus fays nothing at all of it. Now these Modern Authors had a Mind to transplant this Accident to the Temple of Delphos, which was indeed far distant from thence. And fothey write, that by the just Vengeance of God, it was destroyed by Lightning, accompanied with a mighty Earth-quake. But there is no mention made of this great trembling of the Earth, neither by Sozomenus, nor Theodoret, in their Relation of the Fire of Daphne; though others added it, to keep the Thunder Company, and to heighten the Prodigiousness of the Accident.

The Hiftory of Oracles.

But it would be a very troublesome thing, to give you a History of the Duration of all the Oracles, after the birth of Fesus Christ. It is sufficient to consider in what time we find, that some of the principal Ones spoke their last. But you must always re-. member, that it is not understood,

that

Melan-Ethon. BoisTard Hospin.

that this was the very last time they spoke, but that it was the last Occafion Authors had to tell us that they spoke.

Dion, who did not finish his History, till the eighth Year of Alexander Severus, that is, in the 230 Year of Fesus Christ, says, that in his time, Amphilochus delivered Oracles in Dreams: He tells us also, that there was in the City of Apollonia an Oracle, where things to come were foretold by observing the manner how the Fire took hold of the Incense. that was cast upon the Altar. But it was not permitted to ask this Oracle any Questions concerning Death or Marriage. These prevish Restrictions were fometimes founded upon the particular History of the God, who in his Life-time, perhaps had an Occasion given him of taking an Aversion to certain things: Though I am also of Opinion, that they might sometimes come from the ill Success, which those Answers had, that were delivered by the Oracle, concerning some particular Matters.

* Under

The History of Oracles. *Under Aurelius, towards the Zosimus.

Year of Christ 272, the Palmyrenians being revolted, consulted the Oracle of Apollo Sarpedonius in Cilicia. They consulted likewise that of Venus of Aphaca; the Form of which was fo very fingular, that it deserves to be mentioned here. Aphaca, is a Place between Heliopolis and Biblus. Near the Temple of Venus is a Lake like a Cittern: And at certain Assemblies, that are held there at some particular Seasons, there is to be seen a Fire in the Form of a Globe of Lamps: And this Fire, fays Zosimus, has continued to be seen even in our Days, that is to fay, about the 400 Year of Felus Christ. Those that offer, throw into the Lake the Present designed for the Goddess, of what fort soever they be; if the receives them, they fink to the bottom; if she receives them not, they fwim on the Surface of the Water, though they be of Silver, or Gold. In the Year before the Ruin of the Palmyrenians, their Presents funk to the bottom, but the Year following every thing fwam on the * Licinius top.

= Zosiim.

*Licinius having a Design, to renew his War with Constantine, consulted the Oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and had for Answer two Verses of Homer, of which this is the Sense: Unhappy old Man! It is not for thee to fight against Toung Men; thou hast not Strength enough left, for old Age pulls thee down.

*Ammian.

* A God, of no great Reputation, Marcelli- named Besas, delivered Oracles in Answer to Letters at Abydum, a Town in the Confines of Thebais, under the Empire of Constantius. For there were fent to this Emperor certain Letters, which had been left upon the Altar, in the Temple of Besas; upon which, he began to make a very rigorous Profecution against those who had laid those Letters there; and cast into Prison, or sent to Banishment a great Number of Persons, or else caused them to be cruelly tormented: Because by these Letters, they enquired after the Fate of the Empire, or concerning the Duration of the Reign of Constantius, or the Success of some Designs, which which they were framing against him.

In fine, Macrobius, who lived under Arcadius and Honorius, Sons of Theodofius, speaks of the God of Heliopolis in Syria, and of his Oracle, and of the Lots of Antium, in terms which positively prove that they were all remaining in his time.

But here we must observe, that it is of no absolute necessity to our defign, that all these Histories should be true, or that these Oracles did really deliver those very answers which are attributed to 'em; for the very counterfeiting of answers, implies that the Oracles were in being when those answers were pretended to be delivered by them: and 'tis most plain by the Histories, which so many Authors have written of 'em, that they did not believe that they were wholly filenc'd in their days.

> N 2 CHAP.

* Zoli-retu.

* Theodo-

The History of Oracles. 180

CHAP. IV.

That Oracles for the most part were abolish'd at the same time with Heathenism.

Racles for the most part ceas'd when Heathenism was abolish'd, which was not immediately after the coming of Jesus Christ. For Constantine himself demolished but a sew Temples, and he was sain to make the horrid Crimes that were perpetrated there, his pretence for pulling 'em down. On this pretext he plucked down the Temple of * Venus Aphacitis, and that of * Æsculapius *Eusebius. of Ægæ in Cilicia, in both of which there were Oracles. But yet he * prohibited Sacrificing to the Heathen Gods, and by that edict began to make their Temples of no use. The Edicts of Constantins and of Julian (when Con-Stantius had but newly declared him Cæsar) are still extant, wherein on pain of Death they forbid all forts of Divi-

Divination, not only Astrology, interpretation of Dreams and Magick, but also foretelling by the slights of Birds, and by the entrails of Beasts; which gave a mighty shock to the Religion of the Romans. And indeed the Emperors had a particular interest in prohibiting all kinds of fortunetelling, because one or other was always inquiring about their Destiny, and especially to know who was to be the next Successor, who usually, upon the flattery of the Diviner, made a revolt, and fet up his own claim to the Empire.

As there were many Oracles remaining, when Julian was proclaim'd Emperor, so he apply'd himself, as much as he could, to the restauration of those that had been destroyed. For example, that of the Suburbs of Daphne was destroyed by Adrian, * who when he was a *Sozomen. private Man, having dipt a leaf in the Castalian Spring, (for there was one of this Name at Daphne as well as at Deiphos, ) found when he took it out of the Water, a Narrative of what nus Mar-

cellinus.

what was to befal him, and Advice to think of obtaining the Empire.

And therefore when he was afterwards made Emperor, least the same Oracle should give the like counsel to some body else, he caus'd the Sacred Spring to be choak'd up, by throwing a great quantity of Stones into it. There was a great deal of ingratitude in this procedure; but Juli-*Ammia- an * caus'd the spring to be opened, the Dead Bodies, which were Buried near it, to be removed, and the place to be Purified in the same manner as the Athenians had in former time purged the Island of Delos. But Julian went farther, and would needs be himself the Prophet of the Didymæan Oracle; for this he thought would be a means of bringing Prophecies into credit again, which then lay under much contempt. As he was Emperor he was (Pontifex Maximus, or) Chiefest Priest;

was resolved to make it more than an empty Title: And therefore we see that, in one of those Letters of his, which are come to our view, in the quality of Pontifex maximus he suspends a Pagan Priest for three years from the exercise of his Sacred function. And the Letter, which he wrote to Arsaces, Pontifex of Galatia, acquaints us with the way which he took to make Paganism slourish again: He congratulates in the first place his own felicity, in that his zeal had produced such great effects in so short a time; and then he declares his judgment to be, that the best means for the re-establishment of Heathenism would be, to transplant the vertues of Christianity into it, such as Charity towards Strangers, the care of Burying the Dead decently, and that Sanctity of Life which the Christians, as he says, counterfeited so well. He therefore commands that Pontifex to oblige the Priests of Galatia, either by arguments or threats, to live regularly, to abstain from the publick shows and Tipling-houses; N 4 to and tho the Emperors had not been accustomed to make any great use of this Sacerdotal dignity; yet he was to quit all fordid and infamous imployments, to addict themselves, with all their Family, only to the Service o's he Gods, and to have a watchful eye upon the Galileans, ( so he scornfully calls the Christians, ) and to suppress their impieties and profanations. He observes, that it is a great shame, that whilst the Jews and Galileans maintain'd not only their own poor, but such as were Heathens too, the Pagans should let their poor starve, and not remember that Hofpitality and Liberality are vertues fo peculiar and proper to 'em, that Homer brings in Eumæus speaking thus: My guest, if a Man of quality much inferior to thine, had come hither, I must have entertain'd him; for all Men that are either strangers or Poor come to us, as it were on an errand from Jupiter; and tho' I have but little to give, yet I give that little with chearfulness. Last of all, he fets down what distributions he appoints to be made each year to the Poor of Galatia and lebids the Pontifex take care that there be Hospitals. Built

Built in each Town for the reception of Men of other Religions as well as Heathens. He thinks it not befitting the dignity of the Pontifex to make frequent visits to the Governors at their Houses, but that he rather write to'em; nor will he have the Priests go meet 'em, when they come into any Town; but when they come to the Temples, the Priests may go to receive 'em as far as the Porch, but no farther. He also forbids the Governors on fuch an occasion to have their Guards Marching before them, because they are then to be considered only as private Persons; but he gives the Soldiers leave to go in after them, if they will.

With this care, and this imitation of Christianity, it is probable that Julian (if he had lived) would have put some stop to the ruine of his Religion; but it pleased God to cut him off before he had reigned two years.

Jovian, who succeded him, began to endeavour zealously the destruction of Heathenism; but in the seven Months

Months of his Reign it was not poffible for him to make any great progress.

Valens, who had the Eastern Empire, gave liberty of conscience to all Men to worship what Gods they listed, and was himself more inclined to support Arianism than Christianity. * So that during his Reign Sacrifices were publickly made, and Men eat the flesh of the Victims offered up to Idols. The Bacchanalian Mysteries were celebrated openly; they ran up and down with their Thyrsi in their hands; they tore Dogs in pieces, and committed all the other extravagances which are suitable to that Devotion.

Valentinian, his Brother, who had the Western Empire, was more zealous for the glory of Christianity; but yet his conduct was not so steady, as it should have been. He had made a law to forbid all forts of Nocturnal Ceremonies; whereupon Prætextatus, the Proconsul of Greece, represented to him, that if he took away from the Greeks those Ceremonies.

nics, to which they were so mightly addicted, they would lead their Lives unpleasantly. This prevailed with Valentinian, and he confented, that notwithstanding his Law, they might keep their old Customs. It is true, that we have this account from Zosimus a Pagan Historian: and one may fay, that he invented it, to make us believe that the Pagans were still in some credit with the Emperors; but we answer, that Zosimus considering the condition which his Religion was in, was more likely to have been in an humor of complaining of severities that were not acted, than of pleafing himself with the recital of a favour that was never shown. But this is certain however, that there are Old Inscriptions at Rome, and in other Cities of Italy, by which it is manifest, that under the Reign of Valentinian, Persons of great quality celebrated the Sacrifices called Taurobolia and Criobolia, that is to fay, The Sprinkling of Bulls Blood and Rams Blood. Nay by the great number of those Inscriptions one would be made

*Theod. Lib. 5.

made to think that those Ceremonies were the principal ones in fashion, during the time of this Valentinian, and the two other Emperors of the same Name.

Now they being the oddest and most singular of all the Heathen Rites, I suppose that a description of 'em will not be irksome to the Reader. Prudentius, who perhaps had seen them, sets 'em down at length. There was a deep Pit digged, into which the person, for whom the Ceremonies were performed, descended with Sacred Ribons and a Crown upon his Head, and in a dress altogether Mysterious. Over the Pit they placed a Covering made of Planks pierced through with a great many Holes: Upon this Covering they brought a Bull adorned with a Garland of Flowers and little plates of Gold hanging upon his Horns and Forehead. Then his throat was Cut with a Sacred Knife, and his Blood dropt down through the holes that were in the Planks into the Pit, whilest the Person that stood there, received ceived it with much devotion, catching it on his forehead, his Cheeks, his Arms, his shoulders, and every part of his Body, and being industrious that not one drop should fall any where but on himself. At last out he came, a frightful spectacle, all dawb'd with blood, and his Hair, Beard and Cloaths still dropping with it; but his comfort was, that his Sins were all wash'd away, and he was regenerated to all Eternity: For, as it appears by the Inscriptions, this Sacrifice was to those who celebrated it, a Mystical and Eternal Regeneration. But unless it were renewed once in twenty years, it would lose its force, and the perpetuity of its duration. And Women, as well as Men, were capable of this Regeneration; and those, who were not at the Ceremony, might receive the benefit of it by Association: Nay, which is most remarkable of all, whole Cities fometimes performed it by Proxy or Deputation. This Sacrifice was now and then made for the Emperors health: and the Provinces made their Court

Court to him by fending some Person in their name to bedawb himself with Bulls-Blood, for the obtaining of a long and happy Life for the Emperor. All this may be prov'd out of the old Inscriptions.

But now we come to Theodofius and his Sons, who put a full Period to Pagan superstitions.

Theodosius began first in Egypt, where he caused all the Temples to be shut up: At last he went so far as to demolish the Temple of Serapis, which was the most famous of 'em all. And as Strabo informs us, there was nothing more Glorious in the whole Heathen Religion than the Pilgrimages which were made to Serapis. When the time, says he, of certain Festivals was near at hand, it is hard to believe what a multitude of People went down the River from Alexandria to Canopus, where this Temple stood. Day and Night there was nothing to be seen, but Boats full of Men and Women, Singing and Dancing with all the liberty imaginable. At Canopus there were

The History of Oracles. were a vast number of Inns on the River fide, which were of use for the entertainment of the Passingers and accommodating them in their divertisements. And therefore the Sophister Eunapius, who was a Pagan, seems to have had a mighty concern for the Temple of Serapis, and with Gall enough he describes its destruction. Men (fays he) that had never heard the found War, show'd themselves mighty Valiant against the Stones of this Temple, but especially against the rich Offerings, which it was full of: And in those Holy Places they put Monks, a People (says he) infamous and useless; who, because they wear a black and flovenly Habit, arrogate to themselves a Tyrannical Authority over the minds of Men; and instead of those Gods which the light of our natural Reason discovers to us, they fet up for objects of our Adoration, the heads of Malefactors who were executed for their Crimes, which they falt to preserve 'em from Corruption. Thus does this impious wretch treat Monks and Relicks; and certainly certainly the Liberty of those times was very great, when such Invectives were written against the Emperors Religion. Ruffinus informs us, that the Temple of Serapis was found to be full of fecret Passages, and Machines contrived for the Impostures of the Priests. He tells us, amongst other things, that on the East side of the Temple there was a little Window, through which, on a certain day of the Year, the Sun Beams entring, fell just upon the Mouth of Serapis: At the same time, an Image of the Sun made of Iron was brought in, which being attracted by a great Loadstone fixed in the Cieling, ascended up to the Image of Serapis. Then they cried out, that the Sun faluted their God: But when the Iron Image fell down again, and the Sun-Beams went off from Serapis's Mouth, they faid, that the Sun, having finished his Complement, was retired, to go about his own Affairs.

After that Theodosius had deseated the Rebel Eugenius, he went to Rome, where where still the whole Senate stood up for Paganism. Their chiefest Reason was, because, for twelve hundred Years, Rome had thriven wellenough with its Gods, from whom it had received all forts of Prosperity. The Emperor made a Speech in the Senate-House, perswading them to embrace the Christian Religion; but they replied, that by Custom and Experience, they had found Paganism to be a good and convenient Religion; and if they should change it for that of the Christians, they could not foresee what might be the Event. Was not this fine Theology, for the Roman-Senate? Theodofius finding, that this was not the way to deal with them, told them, that the publick Treasury was too much exhausted by making chargeable Sacrifices, and that he had Occasion to imploy that Money in paying his Armies. They replied, that their Sacrifices would not be acceptable, unless they were made at the Charge of the Publick. But that inconvenience was no Argument with bim:

So he put an end to all Sacrifices and old Ceremonies. And Zosimus does not let slip the Occasion of observing, that from that time forwards all forts of Misfortunes happened to the Roman Empire.

The same Author tells us, that when Theodosius made that Voyage to Rome, Serena, the Wife of Stilicon, entred into the Temple of the Mother of the Gods, to put some Affront upon her, and that she made bold to convert to her own use a fair Neck-lace, which the Goddess wore: This an old Vestal Virgin reproved her very sharply for, and, as she went out of the Temple, followed her, curfing her with a thousand Imprecations. After which, fays Zosimus, the poor Serena was often frighted (both waking and fleeping) with a certain Apparition, that threatned her with fudden Death.

But the last Efforts of Paganism were those made by Symmachus, to obtain of the Emperors, Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, the Reestablishment of the Privileges of the Vestals, Vestals, and of the Altar of Victory. in the Capitol; but all the World knows with what Vigour St. Ambrose opposed him. Yet it appears by the very Proceedings in that Contention, that Rome did in those days retain a strong Tincture of Paganism. St. Ambrose asks Symmachus, why the Pagans are not contented with having the Publick Places, Portico's and Baths filled with their Idols, and if nothing will serve their turns, unless the Altar of Victory be set up in the very Capitol, which is the Place of the whole City, whither most Christians resort; that the Christians, fays he, may, whether they will or no, have the Smoak of the Sacrifices blown in their Eyes, the Musick in their Ears, the Ashes in their Throats, and the Incense in their Noses.

Nay, even when Rome was befieged by Alaricus, in the Reign of Honorius, it was still full of Idols. Zosimus complains, that all things conspiring to the Ruin of that unhappy City, the Gods were not only robbed of their Ornaments, but even some of those that were of Gold or Silver were themselves melted down; of which Number was the Goddess of Fortitude, which from that time forward wholly abandoned the Romans. Though this be a lucky hit, yet Zosimus will never make it pass upon us for the true cause of the taking of that City.

2 fome

I am in some suspence, whether upon the Credit of this Author, we may admit the following Story to be true. Honorius forbad all Persons that were not of the Christian Religion, to appear at Court, with a Shoulder-belt, or to have any Military Command. Generidus, a Pagan and Barbarian too, but a Man of great Courage, who commanded the Troops that lay in Dalmatia and Pannonia, came no more into the Emperor's Presence, laid aside his Shoulder-belt, and forbore to exercise his Charge, Honorius one day asked him, how it came to pass, that he came not to Court in his Turn, as it washis Duty to do? To which he replied, That there was a Law made, that dispossessed him of his Belt, and his Command. The Emperor told him, that Law was not for such Men as he was; but he answered, that he could not take the Benefit of any Distinction that separated him from those who prosessed the same Worship with himself. In effect, he would not undertake to act again in his Command, till the Emperor himfelf, compelled to it by Necessity, repealed that Law. If this Story be true, then we may easily judge that Honorius contributed very little to the down-fall of the Heathen Religion.

But at last all Exercise of that Religion was prohibited on Pain of Death, by an Edict of the Emperors Valentinian the Third, and Martian, in the Year of Christ 451. and this was the last Blow given to that Superstition. And yet we find, that those very Emperors, who were so zealous for the Advancement of Christianity, did, for all that, themselves retain some Relicks of Heathenism, which served to augment their Authority.

thority. As for Example, they still took upon them the Title of Pontifex Maximus, that is to say, Chief Patriarch (as it were) of those who divined by the Flights of Birds, and the Entrails of Beasts, and of all the Colleges of Fagan Priests, and Supreme Head of all the ancient Romish

Idolatry. Zosimus pretends that Constantine the Great, Valentinian and Valens willingly accepted from the Heathen Priests both the Title and labit of that Dignity, which according to Custom was presented to them at their Accession to the Empire; but that Gratian refused the Pontifical Office; which being related to the Priests, the principal amongst them replied in a great heat: Si princeps non vult appellari Pontifex, admodum brevi Pontifex Maximus fiet. The Sharpness of which saying lies wholly in the Latin words, and it was grounded on the Revolt of Maximus against Gratian at that time, with a Design to strip him of the Empire.

But the old Inscriptions still remaining, are a Testimony of this matter, more to be credited than Zesimus. There we see the Title of Pontifex Maximus given to the Christian Emperors, even in the sixth Century. Two hundred years after Christianity had ascended the Throne, the *Emperor Justin amongst his other Titles assumes that of Pontifex Maximus in an Inscription, which he had caused to be made for the City of Justinopolis in Istria, which was called by his Name.

To be one of the Gods of a false Religion was surely much worse than to be the Pontisex Maximus of it. Now the Heathens erected the Roman Emperors into Gods: And well they might, seeing they made the City of Rome a Goddess. The Emperors, Theodosius and Arcadius, tho' they were Christians, permitted Symmachus, that great Desender of the Heathen Religion, to give them the Title of (Vestra Divinitas, or) Tour Divinity: Which could be only taken taken in the Sence, and according to the Custom, of the Pagans. And in some Inscriptions, which were set up in Honour of Arcadius and Hone. us, these following Words are to be found; Devotus Numini Majestatiz; eorum, that is, Devoted to their Divinity and Majesty.

But

But the Christian Emperors went farther than the bare receiving of those Titles; for they gave them to themselves: As appears by the Constitutions (or Laws) of Theodosius, Valentinian, Honorius and Arcadius; wherein they fometimes call their Edicts, Heavenly Statutes, and Diwine Oracles: And sometimes they Tav expreily, The most bappy Expedition of our Divinity, &c.

It may be faid, that this was nothing but the Stile of the Court of Chancery; but it was certainly an unjustifiable and ridiculous Stile under the Heatien Religion its self, and a blasphemous one under the Christian. And therefore it is very wonderful, that such like Extravagancies Thould become to familiar and common a way of speaking, that they were in every Bodies Mouth.

The Truth is, that Flattery, which Subjects are so apt to bestow upon their Sovereigns, and the natural Fondness which Princes have for Praise, made the Custom of using these Expressions, last longer than it ought to have done. I confess that the Flattery and the Fondness in this Case were each of them very extraordinary in its kind: And it is no wonder, fince they are things uncapable of being limited to any bounds. That a Man should be in earnest when he gives another Man the Title of a God is hard to conceive, and yet the frequency takes off the Wonder; but that this Man should accept the Title, and that with fo much eafiness, as by Degrees to come to the giving of it to himself (and all this while have a right Notion of what is: truly called God,) This, I say, is a thing that I know not how to give such an Account of, as will fave the Honour of Humane Nature.

As for the Title of Pontifex Maximus, I do not see what was in it, that could flatter the Vanity of the Christian Emperors into the making it so much their Interest to conserve it: But, perhaps, they thought that it was of fome use for the imprinting of a respectful Awe in the Minds of those that were still of the Heathen Religion: Or, it may be, they pleafed themselves with the Supremacy over Christians, which under the Ambiguity of that Title they affumed to themselves. In effect, upon certain Occasions they were Magisterial enough in their use of it: And fome Authors would perswade us, that the Emperors quitted their Pretensions to this Title, out of Respect to the Pope; who, it seems, began to be apprehensive that they might make ill uses of it.

But it is not so surprizing by far, to see these Heathen remains continue for some time in the Christian Religion, as to see what was most barbarous, extravagant, and directly opposite to Reason and the common Interest

The History of Oracles. terest of Mankind, keep such firm footing, as to be the last that left the Field of all the Pagan Superstitions, I mean, Humane Sacrifices. That Religion was certainly very fantastical and full of Variety; for it confifted of fome things extremely frolick, and others no less mournful. In one Place. the Ladies go to the Temples in a fit of Devotion, to offer their Favours to the first Comer: And in another place, the same Devotion causes the throats of Men to be cutupon an Altar. These detestable Sacrifices were practifed by all Nations: The Grecians celebrated them, as well as the Scythians, though not so often; and the Romans (for all that they obliged the Carthaginians, in a Treaty of Peace concluded between them, not to facrifice their Children to Saturn, according to the Custom derived from their Ancestors, the Phanicians, yet) did themselves every Year offer up a Man to Jupiter Latialis. sebius cites Porphyrius for this, as a thing still in usage in his Days. Lactantius and Prudentius, the one in the beginning, and the other in the end of the fourth Age, are Evidences of the same thing, each of them for his own Time. These Ceremonies, that were so full of Horrour, lasted as long as the Superstition of Oracles, which was only lyable to the Reproach of Stupidity and fond Credulity.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

That if Heathenism had not been abolish'd yet Oracles would have ceased; and the first particular Reason hereof.

When Christianity triumphed over it, could do no less than involve Oracles in the common ruine with its self. But it may be farther afferted that Christianity, even before it became the reigning Religion, was an irresistible enemy to Oracles; for the Christians made it their business to disabuse mankind, and discover impostures. And yet if the Christian Religion had never been, Oracles would for other reasons have lost their credit by degrees, and at last have quite fail'd.

It was observ'd that they began to degenerate from the very time when 206

when they left offgiving their answers in Verse. Plutarch has written a tract expresly to enquire about the reason of this Change, wherein (according to the fashion of Greek Authors) he sets down all that could be said on this subject, either true or false. First he saies, that the God who inspires the Pythian Priestess proportions himself to her Capacity, and does not answer in Verse by her, unless she have a natural faculty that way; for the prediction only belongs to Apollo, but the manner of Expression to the Priestess. Thus, it is not the fault of the Musician, if he cannot make as good melody with a Cittern as with a Lute; for the property of the Instrument must be considered. Suppose, it had been the custom for the Oracle to deliver its answers in writing, could we reasonably deny that Apollo inspired 'em, unless the Priestess wrote 'em in a fair hand. The Soul of the Prophetess, when united to Apollo, is like an innocent Maid when she is first Married, who is ignorant both of the

The History of Oracles.

the pleasure and the duty of her new condition.

But why then did the Ancient Priestesses always answer in Verse? Were not they as pure and Virgin Souls, contracted to Apollo? To this Plutarch replies first of all, That even the Ancient Priestesses did now and then speak in Prose. And besides this, in Old times all People were born Poets: so that, as he tells us, they had no fooner drank a little freely, but they made Verses; they had no sooner cast their eyes on a Handsom Woman, but they were all Poefy, and their very common discourse fell naturally into Feet and Rhime: So that their Feasts and their Courtships were the most dele-Ctable things in the World. But now this Poetick Genius has deserted Mankind: and tho' our passions be as ardent as those of our Ancestors, and we talk as much as they did, yet Love at present creeps in humble prose. And even all the Socrates's and Plato's, who discoursed so much concerning that agreeable passion, had had not the least skill in Poetry. Now all this has too much fancy and too little truth in it, to deserve a ferious answer. But Plutarch gives us another reason, which has something more of probability; which is this; that the Ancients wrote alwaies in Verse, whether they treated of Religion, Morality, Natural Philo-Sophy or Astrology. Orpheus and Hefied, whom every body acknowledges for Poets, were Philosophers also: and Parmenides, Xenophanes, Empedocles, Eudoxus, and Thales, whom all Men own for Philosophers, were Poets too. It is very strange indeed that Poetry should be elder Brother to Prose, and that Men did not at first light upon the most natural and easie way of expressing their thoughts; but it is very probable, that fince all their writings were as fo many precepts, they were shap'd into measured lines, that they might be the more eafily remembred: and therefore all their Laws and their rules of Morality were in Verse. By this we may see that Poetry had a much more more ferious beginning than is usually imagin'd, and that the Muses have of late days mightily deviated from their original Gravity. Who would imagine that the Old Statutes should by right have been written in Metre, and Chaucer's Tales in Prose? There was a necessity therefore, saies Plutarch, that Ancient O. racles should be deliver'd in Verses, fince all matters of importance were so; for Apollo was then willing to follow the mode of those times, and when Prose came afterwards to be in use, he was for being in the fashion still.

I am of the same opinion my self, and believe that Oracles at first gave their answers in Verse, both that they might be more easily remembred, and to comply with the custom which had condemned Prose to be used only intrival discourses. But History and Philosophy began to shake off those useles Chains about the Reign of Cyrus. For Thales, who lived at that time, was one of the last Poetick Philosophers; but Apollo continued

The History of Oracles.

nued to speak in Verse till about Pyrthus's daies, as Cicero informs us, which was about two hundred and thirty years after Cyrus. Whence it appears, that Poetry being found suitable to the dignity of Oracles, it was retain'd in use at Delphos, as long as it was possible; till at last plain Prose getting the victory banish'd it quite from thence.

Plutarch could hardly be in earnest, when he said, that Oracles were therefore at last pronounced in Prose, because People began to require clearer answers, and to be weary of the Mysterious bombast of Verses. For whether it were the Gods or but the Priests that spoke, I would sain know how Men durst accuse 'em of obscurity.

But he has more probability on his side, when he pretends, that prophetick versifying sell into contempt, by being in use amongst those Fortune-tellers, who stroling about the High-ways, were consulted by the Rabble: Now, the Priests who belonged to the Temples, scorn'd to use use the same Customs in common with these Gypsies; for they thought themselves to be a nobler and graver fort of Fortune-tellers; which makes a mighty difference, I'll assure you, in this great affair.

But Plutarch reserves his true reason till last: which is, that in former times Men went to confult at Delphos only about matters of the highest consequence; as Wars, Building of Cities, interest of Kings and Commonwealths; whereas now adays, saies he, every ordinary Person runs thither to ask the Oracle, If they shall Marry, If they shall buy a slave, If they shall thrive by their Trade; and when a City fends thither, 'tis only to enquire, whether their Lands will yield a good Crop, or their Cattle increase. These questions deserve not the trouble of an answer in Verse, for if Apollo should take that pains, he would be like those Sophisters, who labour mightily to show their learning, when there is no proper occasion for it.

But now I come to that which P 2 was was the most effectual cause of the wine of Oracles. The Romans made themselves Masters of all Greece, and those Kingdoms founded by - Alexander's Successors: and assoon as the Grecians had submitted to the Roman Yoke, from which they had no hopes of being ever free, they were no longer agitated with the continual divisions and quarrels which

The History of Oracles.

And it is very easie to imagine, that the Priests would not give themselves the trouble of answering in Verse, when they found their trade sell off, and the profit of it was not worth the while.

And as the Romans did the Cracles some prejudice by the peace which they established in Greece, so they did them more by the flight [esteem which they had of 'em themselves: for their folly did not lie that way; they addicted themselves only to the Books of the Sibylls and to the Tuscan Divinations, which were performed by the observations of the flights of Birds and the entrails of Sacrificed Beasts. Now the maximes and opinions of the Victors, eafily obtain amongst the Conquered; and therefore it is no wonder that Oracles, being a Greek invention, should follow the fate of Greece; and that as with her they flourish'd in prosperity, so with her they lost their Ancient Glory.

But for all this, we must acknowledge, that there were some Oracles P 3 in fion to importune the Delphian God.

had wont to harass those petty States, whose interests were so mightily embroiled; for their common Masters made 'em all quiet, and peace was the product of their flavery. And I think, the Greeks had never happy days till then; for they lived in a profound tranquility, and in perfect ease; they passed their time in their places of exercise, in their Theaters, and in their Schoolso Philofophy. They had publick sports, Comedies, Disputations and Harangues; and for Men of their Genius, what could be defired more? But all this afforded little business for Oracles, and there was very feldom any occa-

in Italy. Tiberius, as Suetonius says, went to the Oracle of Geryon near Padua; where there was a certain Spring, if we will believe Claudian, which restored speech to the Dumb and healed all forts of Difeases. Suetonius saies further, that Tiberius had oncea mind to destroy all the Oracles that were near Rome; but he was prevented by the miracle of the Pranestine Lots, which, when they were brought up to Rome in a Box well lock'd and feal'd, were not to be found there; but when the Box was carried back to Praneste, then they were found in it again.

To these Lots of Præneste and those of Antium, we must add the *Statius. Lots of the * Temple of Hercules

Which was at Tibur.

Pliny the Younger thus describes the Oracle of Clitumnus the God of a certain River in Umbria: The Temple is Ancient and much revered; in it stands Clitumnus in a Roman habit, and his Lots manifest his Presence and the power of his Divinity. Round about it, there are several little Chapels, in some of which there are fountains and Springs: for Clitumnus is, as it were, the father of many other little Rivers which join with its Streams. There is a Bridge which separates the Sacred part of these Waters from the prophane. Above this Bridge Men may only go in Boats; but below it they may bathe themselves in the River. This is the only River of my acquaintance that was Oracular, for they had other business to do than to turn Fortune-tellers.

The History of Oracles.

But there were Oracles at Rome it self. Had not Æsculapius one in his Temple which stood in an Island in the River Tibur? There has been found at Rome a piece of a Marble Table, wherein the Miracles of Æsculapius are engraven in Greek. One of the most considerable of which, is this that follows, translated word for word from the Inscription. At the same time the Oracle made this answer to a Blind Man Named Caius. He was bid go to the Sacred Altar, and kneel down and Worship there; then to go from the Right side to the Left,

pels,

Lest, and lay his five fingers upon the Altar, and afterwards clap his hand upon his Eyes. After all this was done, the Blind Man was restored to his Sight, as all the People were Witnelses, and testifyed the joy which they received in seeing such mighty wonders wrought in the Reign of our Emperor Antoninus. The two other Cures are less miraculous; for one was of a Pleurise and the other of a loss of Blood; (both of 'em very desperate Diseases without doubt,) but the God prescribed to the Sick Persons some Pine Apples and Honey with Wine and certain Ashes; which were things that those Men who are something incredulous, will be apt to fay are meerly natural remedies.

These Inscriptions, for all that they are in Greek, were certainly done at Rome; for the form of the Letters and the spelling, do not at all seem to be from the hand of some Grecian. Sculptor. Besides, tho' it be true, that the Romans made their Inscriptions in Latin, yet they made some sew in Greek, especially when they had fome particular reason for it. Now it is very probable, that no other language but Greek was used in the Temple of Æsculapius, because he was originally a Grecian God, and brought to Rome in that great plague, of which every one knows the Story.

fome

Thus we see that the Oracle of Æsculapius was not of a Roman institution: and I doubt not, but that if it were an enquiry worth the while, most of the Italian Oracles would be found to be of a Greek Original.

However it be, the smalness of the number of the Italian Oracles, and even of those that were at Rome it self, makes but a very inconsiderable exception to the generality of the notion which we propose. Æsculapius dealt only in Physick, and concerned not himself in matters of Government: and tho he had a rare knack at making Blind Men see, yet I believe the Senate would have been loth to have depended upon his advice in a case even of the smallest importance.

Private

The History of Oracles.

Private persons amongst the Romans might give what credit they listed to Oracles; but the State had little saith in them. Thus the Sibylls Books and the entrails of Beasts governed all. Andso a vast number of Gods sell into contempt, when People took notice that the Masters of the World would not vouchsafe to consult 'em.

CHAP. VI.

The second particular cause of the Cessation of Oracles.

BUT I meet with a difficulty in this business, that I will not conceal. For if about the time of Pyrrhus, Apollo was reduced to Prose, this implies that Oracles began then to grow into discredit, and yet the Romans were not masters of Greece till a long time after Pyrrhus; and between the Reign of Pyrrhus and the Romans conquest of Greece, there were as many Wars and Commotions in that Country as ever, and by consequence as many important subjects to consult the God of Delphos about.

This indeed is true; but we must also observe that about the time of Alexander the Great, a little before Pyrrhus's days, there appear'd in Greece certain great Sects of Philosophers, fuch as the Peripateticks and Epicureans, who made a mock of Oracles. The Epicureans especially made sport with the paltry Poetry that came from Delphos. For the Priests hammered out their Verses as well as they could, and they oftentimes committed faults against the common Rules of Prosodia. Now those Fleering Philosophers were mightily concerned that Apollo, the very God of Poetry, should come so far behind Homer, who was but a meer mortal, and was beholding to the same Apollo for his inspirations.

It was to little purpose to excuse the matter, by saying, that the badness of the Verses was a kind of Testimony stimony that they were made by a God, who nobly fcorn'd to be tyed up to rules and to be confined to the Beauty of a Style. For this made no impression upon the Philosophers: who, to turn this answer into ridicule, compared it to the Story of a Painter, who being hired to draw the Picture of a Horse tumbling on his Back upon the ground, drew one running full speed: and when he was told, that this was not such a Picture as was bespoke, he turned it upside down, and then ask'd if the Horse did not tumble upon his back now. Thus these Philosophers jeered such Persons, who by a way of arguing that would ferve both ways, could equally prove that the Verses were made by a God, whether they were good or bad.

So that at length the Priests of Delphos being quite baffled with the railleries of those learned Wits, renounced all Verses, at least as to the speaking them from the Tripos; for there were still some Poets maintain'd in the Temple, who at leisure turned turned into Verse, what the Divine sury had inspired the Pythian Priesstess withal in Prose. It was very pretty, that Men could not be contented to take the Oracle just as it came piping hot from the Mouth of their God. But perhaps, when they had come a great way for it, they thought it would look silly to carry home an Oracle in Prose.

Nay the Gods, being willing to keep up the use of Verses as long as ever they could, did now and then stoop to borrow a line or two out of Homer; whose Poetry, it seems, was better than their own. Of this there are abundance of Examples; but, both this borrowing of Verses, and keeping Poets at standing wages in their Temples, may well pass for good arguments that the old natural Poetry of Oracles had mightily lost its reputation.

But these great Sects of Philosophers, enemies to Oracles, must needs have done them a more essential prejudice than the bare reducing them to Prose. For questionless they opened the eyes of a great many rational persons, and even amongst the populace they made the infallibility of those things lie under more suspicion than it had done before. For when Oracles sirst crept out into the World, Philosophy had not yet appear'd.

To

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

The last particular causes of the Cessation of Oracles.

H E cheats of Oracles were for gross, that at last they were discovered by a thousand several accidents. I suppose that Oracles were at first entertained with greediness and joy, because that nothing could be more convenient than to have Gods always ready at hand to answer every question that might be suggested by uneasiness or curiofity: and I fansie that it was with a great deal of reluctancy that People parted with this supposed conveniency; and that Oracles would never have come to an end as long as Heathenism lasted, if they had not been the most impertinent things in the World. But at last Men were forced to yield to their own experiences and fuffer themselves to be disabused.

To this the Priests gave no small help by the extreme Impudence, which they used in the Exercise of their false Ministry; for they thought that things were brought to fuch a Point, that there was no occasion for any Circumspection.

I say nothing of the Waggishness of the Oracles, which they sometimes Athena- delivered: For Example, *To a Man that came to ask of the Deity, What he should do to grow rich, he answered very pleasantly, That he need do no more than get all the Land between Sycione and Corinth. And fometimes the Consulter would make free with the God: Polemon, sleeping in the Temple of Asculapius, to learn of him how to cure his Gout, the God appeared to him and told him: That he must abstain from cold Drink. Polemon replied, you would be puzled then, my good Friend, if you were consulted about an Ox? But these were but the gayeties and frolicks of the Priests, who would sometimes both give and take a Jest.

But it was still more remarkable, that

The History of Oracles. that the Gods never failed to fall in Love with the fair Ladies; for they must come and pass away the Nights in their Temples, tricked up for the purpose by their own Husbands, and furnished with Presents to make the God amends for his pains. 'Tis not' to be doubted, but that the Doors of the Temple were shut up in the sight of the whole World, but who could secure the Husbands against the Pasfages under Ground.

For my Part, I do not question, but such Intrigues were often practised. And Herodotus writes, that in the eighth and uppermost Story of that lofty Tower belonging to the Temple of Belus in Babylon, there! was a Magnificent Bed, where there lay every Night a pretty Woman fel lected by the God. The like was done at Thebes in Egypt: And when the Priestels of the Oracle of Patara in Lycia was to prophesie, she must first take a Nights Lodging all alone in the Temple, whither Apollo came (forfooth) to inspire her.

All these things were practised during ring the darkest Mists of Paganism, and in times when Heathen Ceremonies were not to be contradicted; but in the view of the very Christians themselves Saturn of Alexandria had such Women brought in the Night to his Temple, as he thought fit to chuse by the Mouth of his Priest Tyrannus. Many Women had received this Honour with a great deal of devout Respect, and none of them made any Complaints of Saturn, though he was the Oldest and the least a Gallant of all the Gods. But at last there was one, who having had her Nights lodging in the Temple, considered with her felf, that nothing had passed there, but what mortal Man was capable of performing, and Tyrannus could have done himself: And so she acquainted her Husband with her Suspicion, who hereupon accused Ty-The unhappy Priest conrannus.

Thus the Wickedness of the Priests, their Insolence, and several Chances of Alexandria.

fessed all; and the Lord knows what a scandal this gave to the Inhabitants

The History of Oracles.

Chances that had discovered their Cheats, and the Obscurity, Uncertainty and Falseness of their Answers would at last have quite ruined the Reputation of Oracles, and entirely abolished them, even if Heathenism had not been come to a Period. But the thing became more unavoidable by the Addition of other Foreign Reafons: Such as first the Raillery of the Grecian Philosophers, then the little use the Romans had always of them, and last of all the Christians utter detestation of them, and putting a full end to them and Paganism together.

FINIS.

THE

CONTENTS.

The First Discourse.

That Oracles were not delivered by Damons, Page 5.

Chap. I. HE first Reason why the Primitive Christians believed that Oracles were delivered by Dæmons, and the surprizing Histories that were published concerning Oracles and Genii. Page 7 Chap. 2. The second Reason why the Primitive Christians believed, that Oracles were supernatural, and the Agreement of this Opinion with

the

The Contents.

_
the System of Christia Chap 2 The third	Maritan
Chap. 2. The thind	p. T
Chap. 3. The third	Reason of th
- · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	takon fuara I
Philosophy of Plato. Chap. 4. That the surp	p. 15
	ハイベスパク トーモナノトゥー
ries of Oracles ought to	be suspected.
Chap. 5. That the com	mon Osi.
Some ning Ofactes doe.	snot narea C
TOULD US ALL PROPERTY OF	7+1-411
Stian Religion. Chap. 6. That Demo	en the Chri-
Chan 6 That Do	p.38.
Sufficiently established t	y Paganism.
Chap. 7. That some Gra	and Costa c
the Pagan Philosophers,	did met 1
lieve there was are	ara nor believe there was any	thing su-
Poi natural in Oracles.	' TO
E. S. I was other 1	vien hehder
- Indiophers have had the	ttle Elle
Jor Cracies.	n (1
Chap. 9 That the ancie	p. 00
ans themselves did and	M Christians themselves did not	very firmly octione that Oracles wer	edelivered
bæmons.	n ag
hap. 10. That Oracles	111040
rupted by Bribery.	- O
•	Chap

The Contents.

Chap. 11. Of the Erection racles.	of new 0-
racles.	P.93
Chap. 12. Of the Place:	s where O-racics were.	D TOT
Chap. 13. Of the Dist.  Days, and other My	inctions of
Days, and other M	vsteries of
Caracies.	DATIO
Chap. 14. Of Oracles	that were delivered in Answer	to Sealed
Letters.	D. LTO
Chap. 14. Of Oracles  delivered in Answer  Letters.  Chap. 15. Of Oracles de	tivered in
Chap. 16. Of the Ambig	uity of O-
. raeles.	D. T 2 4
Chap.17. The Cheats of O	racles ma-mifestly discovered.	p. 140
Chap. 18. Of Lots.	P. 143
	x43

THE

THE

CONTENTS.

The Second Discourse.

That Oracles did not cease at the coming of Jesus Christ. Page 151.

Chap. 1. HE Weakness of those Reasons upon which the Reasons upon which the Opinion, that Oracles ceased at the coming of Jesus Christ, is founded.

Page 152 Chap. 2. Why the Ancient Authors contradicted each other, very often, about the time of the Cessation of Oracles. p. 163.

Chap. 3. The History of the Duration of the Oracle of Delphos, and Some other Oracles. p. 167

Chap.

The Contents

Chap. 4. That Oracles for the most part were abolished, at the same time with Heathenism. p. 180. Chap. 5. That if Heathenism had not been abolished, yet Oracles would have ceased; and the first particular Reason hereof. p. 205 Chap. 6. The second particular Cause of the Cessation of Oracles. p. 218. Chap. 7. The last particular Causes of the Cessation of Oracles. p. 221

F I N I S. 2 9

Town of the Pine Come

inconting Wind

Control of the second of the s